Pedro Henriquez d' Azevedo had his training in Naples in 1557 with Fernando Alvarez de Toledo, the 3rd Duke of Alba (1507–1582), the governor of the Duchy of Milan, 1555–1556, the Viceroy of Naples, 1556–1557, the Governor of the Habsburg Netherlands, and the Viceroy of Portugal, 1582–1584. The two men have a nasty reputation in the Netherlands for their relentless behavior and rule by fear rather than control by moral leadership.

D'Azevedo participated in the 1580 campaign in Portugal under the Duke of Alba and, in 1582, was given supreme command over the Spanish troops. In 1589, as Captain-General of Portugal, he successfully defended Lisbon against John Norreys and Francis Drake's attack.

He was sent to the Netherlands in 1591, where, after the death of Alexander Farnese, he assisted Farnese's successor, Peter Ernst von Mansfeld and later Ernst of Austria. His excessive severity resulted in a bad reputation for the Spanish, so the circumstances persuaded H.M. King Felipe II to replace him with Albert of Austria, shown in Figure 29.82.

A lot of information about the Siege of Cambrai, shown in Figures 29.78 and 29.79, can be found for instance in Madame Clément's work[46].

The Siege of Cambrai, in which Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) was involved and injured in his face by an arrow, occurred from August 11 until October 7, 1595. The French had occupied the city since 1581 when a regiment of Count Fuentes liberated Cambrai.

The attack focussed first on Le Catelet (between Saint Quentin and Cambrai) and Doullens (North of Amiens). The Spanish freed both places.

The French, led by Henri de la Tour d'Auvergne, the Duque of Bouillon, Saint-Paul, and Villars, came to help the French but were defeated, and the Duque was killed on July 24, 1595. When the Siege of Cambrai began on August 11, many French regiments were engaged in Burgundy, fighting the Spanish during the battle of Fontaine-Française of June 6, 1595, and in consecutive struggles.

The French tried hard to help Cambrai but needed more finances to organize an adequate army. Afterward, it was shown that, ultimately, the people of Cambrai, unhappy with Governor Balagny, had opened one of the gates to let the Spanish in. Inside the city, the French garrison retreated into the citadel.

Nevertheless, without supplies, they surrendered on October 9. Cambrai, which was not 'French' but belonged to Cambresis and was by inheritance part of the Spanish Netherlands, was officially abandoned by the French in the Treaty of Vervins on May 2, 1598; the treaty ended the war between France and Spain.

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) helped further defend the city of Cambrai against the French. Meanwhile, there was still a military presence in Figures 29.80 and 29.81 in Kortrijk. We also found traces of the German military at that time in Kortrijk.

29.5.20 The Hospital of Saint-Jean at Citadel of Cambrai

The Hospital of Saint-Jean at the Citadel of Cambrai is a testament to the enduring legacy of the Knights Templar, an order founded in the early 12th century to protect Christian pilgrims in the Holy Land. In Chapter 17, among others, explanations with evidence are provided about the Desclergues and their role as Knight's Templars. Though the Templars were disbanded in 1312 by Pope Clement V under pressure from King Philip IV of France, their influence persisted through the institutions they established across Europe. Among these institutions were numerous hospitals and hospices bearing the name of Saint John, a nod to their patron saint, John the Baptist.

The Citadel of Cambrai, strategically situated in northern France, became a focal point of military and humanitarian efforts during the medieval period. The Hospital of Saint-Jean, established by the Templars within the citadel, was initially intended to provide care for sick and wounded pilgrims and soldiers. Despite the dissolution of the Templar Order, the hospital continued to operate under various ecclesiastical and secular authorities, adapting to the changing political and religious landscape of the region.

By the late 16th century, Europe was embroiled in the tumultuous period of the Wars of Religion, with France experiencing significant internal conflict between Catholics and Huguenots (French Protestants). In this context, the Hospital of Saint-Jean at Cambrai remained a crucial site for medical care and refuge, its mission echoing the charitable ideals of its Templar founders.

The year 1596 was particularly notable for Cambrai, as explained in Chapter 29.5.19. The city, which had oscillated between French and Spanish control, was central to a significant military and political event. During this time, the Hospital of Saint-Jean played a critical role in the lives of the inhabitants and the soldiers stationed at the citadel.

Jeroni's eldest son was Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06). He went to Spain in 1639 to attend the Corts at Montblanc and returned from Spain in 1640 or 1641.

He made a significant donation to the Saint John Hospital of Cambrai. As already mentioned, his father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), had been severely injured in the face by an arrow in 1596 during the Siege of Cambrai. Following the injury, he stayed at Cambrai and was treated at the Hospital of Saint-Jean of Cambrai.

For one reason or another, gratitude or moral reasons linked to the narrative above, he must have intended to return a favor. Since he died in 1604, he could not deliver his promise. Therefore, his son Antoni (DC06) would fulfill the pledge in 1641 by donating money to the hospital on his father's behalf.

Indeed, Wilbert[47] shows the list of known persons from whom the Saint-Jean Hospital of Cambrai has received donations: 'Noms des personnes auxquelles l' hopital Saint-Jean a du sa dotation.' On page 541, we can read that a gift was given on behalf of Jeroni Desclergue (his name was spelled in French as Jérôme Leclercq) in 1641.

Note that Cambrai belonged to the Spanish Netherlands until it was seized by the French in 1677, during Louis XIV's regime. French hostilities at Cambrai retook place from 1672 until 1677.

29.5.21 The Siege of Calais and Ardres in 1596

Although Jeroni Desclergue was active as a military officer in different locations, church certificates clearly show that the area of Kortrijk must still have been a military stronghold.

The Siege of Calais, shown in Figure 29.83, took place from April 8 until April 1596 and was commanded by Archduke Albert of Austria (Alberto de Austria). He was then the new Governor-General of the Spanish Netherlands. The earlier governor had been the Archduke Ernest of Austria. In between his death and Albert's appointment, the Spanish army had been commanded by Pedro Henriquez de Acevedo, Count of Fuentes.

Don Luis de Velasco y Velasco, Count of Salzar, married to Anne de Hénin, led the Siege in situ.

More information is given in Chapter 34 on Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Jeroni's son because he was military at some point under Luis de Velasco's command.

In fact, in the preceding years, France's situation had been somewhat similar to that in the Netherlands at the beginning of the religious conflict, i.e., there were rebellions and regular troops, and there were Catholics and Protestants. Some towns took one side; others took the other. During those conflicts, the Spanish supported the Catholics and placed large areas and many cities under their control.

When Henry IV of France, shown in Figure 29.84, came to power, he openly took the Catholics' side, was crowned in Paris, and consequently wanted the Spanish Catholic territories back. His desire caused conflicts with the Spanish, who decided, through Albert's leadership, to end the war by forcing a military victory against France.

Therefore, the Spanish troops were gathered in Valenciennes and attacked France, the first city being Calais, to control the coast and the English Channel better. The Dutch, who supported the French in squeezing Belgium and the Spanish, attempted to relieve Calais by sending ships from Zeeland, but they were too late. The French were more successful in providing some assistance overseas but ultimately failed because the Spanish artillery was invincible.

Around 200 Spanish forces were killed or wounded. The French casualties, however, outnumbered the Spanish.

Pictures of the fortifications of Calais are shown in Figures 29.86 and 29.87.

In addition to the references mentioned above, we may add the following: Wagner and Walters[48], Campbell et al.[49], Whittemore[50], Arnold-Baker[51], Giménez Martín[52], and McCoog[53].

After capturing Calais ('Cales'), the Spanish rushed to Guynes, Ham and Ardres ('Arda') to capture these fortresses. Ardres, shown in Figure 29.85, near Calais and Saint-Omer in France, fell in Spanish hands on May 26, 1596, and the occupation lasted two years. The population was promised that they could preserve their property and the city's privileges. In addition, they were guaranteed that there would be no such social trauma as in Doullens in 1595 and Calais in 1596 or the sack of Amiens in 1597. In Ardres, a convoy comprising more than 1500 French soldiers was authorised to leave the city, eagerly followed by the Bourgeoisie of the town.

We provide evidence of Jeroni playing a significant role in the captures of Calais and Ardres in Chapter 29.5.2. Indeed, in Brussels, Diego de Durango, of the Tercio de Maestre de Campo Luis del Villar, testified on Jeroni 's actions on January 14, 1598.

29.5.22 The Siege of Hulst in 1596

The Dutch had captured Hulst, shown in Figure 29.88, from the Spanish in 1591, and the Spanish wanted to take it back.

With Bergen Op Zoom and Breda in mind, the Spanish marched through Brabant but decided to take Hulst, an easier target. The assault lasted from the middle of July in 1596 until August 18.

To the surprise of the Spanish, the inhabitants gave up when they realized that the Spanish had been able to dig and mine the city walls. They wanted to avoid unnecessary casualties. The city surrendered on August 18.

Later, Maurice of Nassau attempted to release the town, but by then, the Spanish had reinforced their new positions so much that any such attempt was useless.

Nevertheless, the Spanish victory was achieved at a significant cost. Sixty officers and more than 5000 men were dead, most of them by illness, however.

We refer to the works of Ortega[54], Edmundson[55], and Fruin[56].

Evidence of Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) contribution is shown in Chapter 29.5.2.

29.5.23 The Battles of Turnhout, Alphen and Moers in the North-East, in 1597

In the context of the battles of 1597, the involvement of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) is well-documented, as proven in Chapter 29.5.2. These three significant battles occurred in the Northeast, where the Spanish captured Amiens, detailed in Chapter 29.5.24. Desclergue's involvement in each of these events marks 1597 as his most active year, prompting his subsequent retirement and return to Spain, as noted in Chapter 29.5.26. However, he would later return to military service and was ultimately killed at the Siege of Ostend in 1604, as discussed in Chapter 29.5.27.

Traditionally, battles were organized in the spring. However, in 1597, the Spanish sought to surprise the Dutch States and English forces. The Spanish assault was led by Count Varax and Nicolo Basta, while the defense was headed by Maurice of Nassau (Dutch) and Francis Vere (English). The Battle of Tielenheide on January 24, 1597, exemplifies this strategic surprise. The subsequent surprise capture of Amiens was a retaliation for the Spanish defeat at Turnhout. At Turnhout, depicted in Figure 29.89, the Spanish forces comprised elite troops from the 'Gran Tercio Viejo de Nápoles' under the command of the Marquis of Treviso, along with five squadrons of Spanish cavalry commanded by Nicolo Basta. The cavalry regiments were led by Juan de Cordova, Alonzo de Mendoza, Juan de Guzmán, and Alonzo Mondragon, supplemented by Walloon, German, and Burgundian regiments. The 'Gran Tercio Viejo de Nápoles' would later participate in the Siege of Ostend, where Jeroni (DC05) perished in 1604.

The Battle of Turnhout was catastrophic for the Spanish troops, resulting in 2000 casualties (killed or wounded), many captured, and the remainder fleeing with Nicolo Basta. The Spanish faced another defeat at Nieuwpoort in 1600. By then, Jeroni (DC05) was in Barcelona, not Flanders. The 1597 victory at Turnhout significantly boosted Dutch morale, while the capture of Amiens highlighted Spanish resilience. Maurice of Nassau, benefiting from these successes, secured funding for an eastern military campaign. On August 20, after a ten-day siege, he captured Rheinberg, and his forces moved south, reaching Moers on August 29, as shown in Figure 29.90. The Spanish defense at Moers was led by Andreas de Miranda, under the command of Herman van den Bergh, responsible for the Spanish-held Upper-Gelre. The Dutch troops dug trenches and planned an assault, leading to the city's surrender. Nassau also captured Grol in the same year.

The Siege of Moers, known as het Beleg van Meurs, saw Dutch troops under Maurice of Nassau capture the city on September 3, 1597. Earlier that year, Nassau had also taken Rheinberg, a city that frequently changed hands during the Dutch-Spanish wars, earning the epithet La puta de la Guerra. In 1598, Francesco de Mendoza led the Spanish to recapture Rheinberg. The siege by the Dutch from August 9 to August 20, 1598, culminated in the Spanish surrender, overwhelmed by the nearly 10000 Dutch troops and their heavy artillery.

29.5.24 Surprise Capture of Amiens in the South, 1597

As with the earlier battles, the involvement of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) is proven in Chapter 29.5.2. For the author, it is interesting that the events in the summer of 1597 took place exactly 400 years before his marriage and adventure in Sri Lanka in 1997.

The Spanish expression, since then rephrased in many languages, 'Mucho ruido y pocas nueces,' comes from Hernándes Teillo Portocarrero's capture of Amiens in 1597. It was an alternative form, at the end of the 16th century, of an earlier expression 'más es el ruydo que las nuezes' used in the book 'Libro de Buen Amor' by Juan Ruiz in 1330, or the work 'La Celestina' by Fernando de Rojas in 1499. In English, it's usually used as 'Much ado about Nothing.'

On March 10, 1597, Jeroni Desclergue captured, with his company, the city of Amiens. The city would, however, be taken back by King Henri IV of France later that summer. The sack served as revenge for the defeat at Turnhout a few months earlier.

The assault was led by Hernándes Teillo Portocarrero and involved 7000 infantry and 700 cavalry. The event is well-described in the literature. Since then, Amiens inhabitants have had the nickname of 'maqueux d' gueugues' (walnut eaters).

Note that Portocarero's (grand)son Gaspar Portocarrero would marry, much later, at Harelbeke in 1643, shown in Figure 34.87 on page 554. Harelbeke is next to Deerlijk, where Jeroni Desclergue 's descendant, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), would settle.

So, Hernándes Teillo Portocarrero led 7000 infantry and 700 equestrians and advanced in the night of 10 to March 11, 1597, towards Amiens, the capital of Picardy, shown in Figure 29.92.

He placed small squads of soldiers on the road and all the paths leading to the city to arrest everyone they met. Five hundred men had to hide near the town. He also chose 30 soldiers dressed as peasants, with arms under their clothes, hoods, and baskets, like farmers going to the market to trade their goods. With three wagons, they advanced to the city and entered through one of the gates.

Then, they overturned a cart filled with walnuts, shown in Figure 29.91, to create clutter. The inhabitants shouted at the 'peasants' and took advantage of the situation. They all hamstered as many nuts as possible. Then, the disguised Spanish soldiers took up their weapons and terrified some inhabitants while they opened the gates for the other soldiers to enter the city and take over Amiens.

The event is also known as the 'Surprise of Amiens.'

Juan de Rivas, who would later appear in Ostend, also took part in this capture of Amiens.

29.5.25 A New Career in Tournai in the Spring of 1598

For a person of Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) standing, residing in Flanders, would definitely have wanted him to reside in Tournai, with a view of its splendid cathedral, shown in Figure 29.116 on page 422.

Much information about the Spanish period of Tournai before the arrival of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) in Flanders can be read in the work of Manuel Herrero Sanchez from the University of Murcia.[57] The following reference comes from the Desclergue and de Pedrolo archive at Urgell and is shown in Figures 29.93 and 29.94. The fragment states that 'His Serene Highness Albert Archduke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, and Captain-General of his Majesty's army' granted Jeroni Desclergue a leave from the army, in Brussels, on December 22, 1597, after which he was able to return to Spain.'

The fragment tells that several important persons endorsed the qualified services of Jeroni Desclergue:

Hernán Tello Portocarrero, captain of the Spanish infantry, governor of the castle, and the town of Doullens ('Durlans'), certified it in the court of Doullens on January 8, 1596. Note that a descendant, Gaspar Portocarrero married in Harelbeke on April 11, 1643, as mentioned above and shown in Figure 34.87 on page 554.

Antonio Mosquera ('Masquera'), captain of the Spanish infantry in the Tercio of the field master Don Alonso de Mendoza, certified it in Brussels on January 15, 1596.

Rafael Ruis de Terrades, captain and Sergeant-Major of the Spanish infantry, certified it in Brussels on January 31, 1596.

Andrés Ortiz, Spanish infantry captain of the Tercio of the Field Master ('Maestro de Campo') Ruis del Villar, certified it in Brussels on January 14, 1598.

From Santiago, Manuel de Vega Cabeza de Vaca certified it in Brussels on January 20, 1598.

Gerónimo Garrafa, Marquis of Monte-Negro, of His Majesty's council of war in Flanders, certified it also in Brussels on January 20, 1598.

Caspar Sapena, Master of the Spanish infantry field, made his statement in Malines/Mechelen ('Malniase') on February 1, 1598.

Caspar Sapena, described in Chapter 37.4.2, was the grandfather of Martina de la Cruz, who married Jeroni's grandson Antoni Declerque (DC07) at Deerlijk in 1656.

Don Alonso de Mendoza of the council of war in Flanders, Castilian, governor, and captain-general of the citadel, and the town of Cambrai ('Cambray'), in the county and country of Cambresis ('Cambressis'), certified it in Cambray on February 29, 1598.

Field Master ('Maestro de Campo') Ruis del Villar, certified it in Maubeuge ('Manbeuge') on March 2, 1598.

Francisco del Arco, captain of the Spanish infantry, from the Tercio of the Field Master ('Maestro de Campo') Ruis del Villar, certified it on March 3, 1598.

Captain Alonso de Ribera, sergeant major from this Tercio, certified it in Brussels on March 20, 1598.

Iñigo Distaola, captain of this same Tercio Spanish infantry, certified it in Kortrijk ('Cortre') on December 5, 1598.

The Governor Simón Antúnez, Master de Campo of the Spanish Infantry, certified it in Tournai ('Tornay') on May 8, 1605. Simón Antúnez is also described in Figure 29.7 on page 370 and resided in Tournai, just like Jeroni Desclergue.

It can be found in 'Histoire De La Ville Et Cité De Tournai, Capitale Des Nerviens Et Premier Siége De La Monarchie Françoise, published in 1750' , that Philippe de Croy, a General in de Spanish army and also Comte de Solre and Marquis de Renti, served as governor of Tournai from 1596 onwards. Jeroni Desclergue was temporarily released from his duties on December 22, 1597[58].

[57] Manuel Herrero Sanchez, "IX. Defender la Patria y defender la Religión: las milicias urbanas en los Países Bajos Españoles, 1580-1700."

On January 14, 1598, Jeroni 's captain Diego de Durango offered him, in Brussels, a remarkable diploma of recognition for all his military achievements, as can be found in the reference mentioned earlier by Santiago Alberti. It must have been at 'Hof van Brussel' (Paleis op de Koudenberg, Brussels), after which the Declercq family would later also name their farm at Wielsbeke.

The Treaty of Vervins of May 2, 1598, had ended the war between France and Spain, making Tournai a safer place. André Woestijn[59] writes that Harelbeke, for instance, had a plague outbreak in the period 1597-1599. This may have contributed to a decision to reside in Tournai rather than the area Kortrijk-Harelbeke-Deerlijk. We assume he took other duties in Tournai, but he returned to Spain and arrived in Barcelona on October 14, 1598. We also refer to Chapter 29.8.

Indeed, thanks to higher administrative positions, it was around that time that Jeroni was capable of establishing good relations with families at Kortrijk, Tournai, and areas with trade links to Tournai, such as Lille, Valenciennes, and other regions. His descendants would highlight those bonds in the decades to come through marriages and the chapel's construction at Deerlijk by his son Antoni (DC06), described in Chapter 34, Chapter 34.5.16, and Chapter 49.

29.5.26 Short Career in Barcelona and Membership of the Corts 1598-1602

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) arrived in Barcelona, depicted in Figure 29.95 on page 414, on October 14, 1598. As detailed in Chapter 8.10, the Spanish Road at that time either ran from Brussels to Namur, Luxembourg, Epinal, Baume-les-Dames, Champagnole, St. Claude, Pont de Gressin, Bourg-St-Maurice, Aosta, Milan, Genoa, and Barcelona; or alternatively from Brussels to Namur, Luxembourg, Thionville, Metz, Nancy, Epinal, Baume-les-Dames, Besançon, Arinthod, Annecy, Albertville, Aiguebelle, Turin, Milan, Genoa, and Barcelona. The following year, Desclergue attended the Corts of Barcelona.

According to the fragment in Figure 29.96 on page 414, upon his arrival in Barcelona, His Majesty immediately granted Desclergue a salary of 12 escudos per month to serve the Duke of Feria, the Viceroy of the Principality. This decision was made by the King at San Lorenzo de El Escorial, depicted in Figures 29.110 and 29.111, on October 14, 1598, and December 5, 1598, respectively.

When Jeroni left for Spain in 1598, he was accompanied by Carlos Coloma, briefly described in Chapter 29.5.2. Coloma became governor of Roussillon (then Catalonia) from 1600 until 1611 and Viceroy of Mallorca from 1611 until 1617. In 1617, Coloma returned to Flanders, and Jeroni's son Antoni (DC06) joined him, as noted in Chapter 34.5.

Jeroni served the Viceroy Duke of Feria, Lorenzo Suárez de Figueroa y Córdoba, depicted in Figure 29.100 on page 415. Born in Mechelen, Belgium in 1559 and deceased in Naples in 1607, the second Duke of Feria was the son of Gómez Suárez de Figueroa y Córdoba, the first Duke of Feria, and Jane Dormer, an English Catholic lady-in-waiting to Mary I. The Duke held various positions, including Spanish Ambassador in Rome (1591–1592) and France (1593–1595), Viceroy of Catalonia (1596-1602), and Viceroy of Sicily (1603-1607). During his tenure as Viceroy of Catalonia, Desclergue served him.

Desclergue's stay in Barcelona allowed him to attend the Corts of 1599 with his father, Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04), and his brother, Francesc Desclergue (DC05e). As noted in Figure 29.97, Jeroni Desclergue was among the Catalan knights who entered the Corts held in Barcelona in 1599.

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) received a noble title from the King of Spain in 1599, maintaining his loyalty to the Crown. This information is corroborated by various sources, including J. Reglà,[60] A. Figueroa y Melgar,[61] J. M. Torras Ribé,[62] J. C. Rubio Masa,[63] and V. Vázquez de Prada.[64]

Lorenzo Suárez de Figueroa, the 2nd Duke of Feria, served as Ambassador for Felipe II and Felipe III, Viceroy of Catalonia and Sicily. He lost his position as Viceroy of Catalonia on April 16, 1602, due to a conflict with the Corts.In response to this disruption, Jeroni sent his wife Felipa de Montoya and the children back to Tournai. Those children were Juana Desclergue (DC06c), born 1588 and described in Chapter 29.9.1, Anna Desclergue (DC06f), born in 1595 and described in Chapter 29.9.3, and newborn Antoni Desclergue (DC06), described in Chapter 34 and Chapter 49.

Meanwhile, Jeroni requested a new position in Belgium and was invited by King Felipe III to Madrid for further instructions. On June 2, 1602, he was tasked with recruiting soldiers for Flanders and returned to Tournai when he completed this mission by the end of 1602.

The political conflict leading to the Duke's dismissal stemmed from his tenure as ambassador to France and the subsequent retreat of Spanish troops from Paris in 1594. After a brief stint in Brussels as a member of the Council of State under Archduke Ernest, the Duke returned to Spain via Italy in 1596, insisting on rewards for his services. Felipe II appointed him Viceroy of Catalonia, where he took office on November 19, 1596, in the Cathedral of Barcelona.

During the final years of Felipe II's reign, the primary concern was the war with the England-France-Holland coalition, impacting the Pyrenean border, particularly Roussillon and Cerdanya. After Felipe II's death, the Duke of Feria continued as Viceroy under Felipe III, focusing on the Corts of Barcelona in 1599 and the ongoing war with France. Felipe III stayed in Barcelona from May 18 to July 13, 1599.

In Barcelona, the Corts of Catalonia of 1599 were preceded by H.M. King Felipe III of Spain (II of Aragon), shown in Figure 29.100, at the Convent de Sant Francesc, shown in Figure 29.98. At the Corts, the Catalan laws were defined and published in the constitution shown in Figure 29.99.

Some attendees and representatives are noted in the context of this manuscript, such as H.R.H. Isabel Clara Eugenia of Spain, Governor of the Netherlands and the Countess of Flanders, Artesis, and Burgundy and also the Duchess of Brabant, Limburg, and Luxemburg; Albert VII of Austria, governor of the Netherlands; and many others. Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) appears as 'Jeroni Desclergue i Cortés.'

A significant exchange occurred between the King and the Catalan Corts, with the King receiving substantial financial support from Catalonia in return for ennobling many Catalans, including Desclergue. However, a conflict arose later between the Viceroy and the Corts over specific laws, leading to the Duke's dismissal on April 16, 1602. The Archbishop of Tarragona succeeded him. After his tenure in Catalonia, the Duke of Feria became Viceroy of Sicily (1602-1606) and later an ambassador to the Austrian Empire, dying en route between Naples and Rome in January 1607. He is interred at the convent of Santa Clara in Zafra alongside his second wife, Isabel de Mendoza, and his first-born son Íñigo.

Figure 29.101, on page 416, of the Catalan constitution of 1599, published in 1603, lists significant figures including Bonaventura Desclergue (DC04), Jeroni Desclergue ('Hieronymus Dezclergue') (DC05), Francesc Desclergue (DC05e), Luis Desclergue (DC02dy2y2), and Jeroni Desclergue ('Hieronymus Dezclergue Barcinone domiciliati') (DC02dy2y1). This indicates that Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), recently returned from Flanders, had not stayed long enough to be considered an inhabitant of Barcelona in 1599. Instead, Jeroni (DC02dy2) was noted as a resident to distinguish him from our Jeroni (DC05).

On page 'CAPITOLS Y ACTES DE CORT. FOL. LXV,' depicted in Figure 29.101 on page 416, Lorenzo Suárez de Figueroa, the 2nd Duke of Feria, is noted for guiding Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) into the Corts of Barcelona in 1599. Notably, Alfonso Coloma de Saa, the brother of Jeroni's friend Carlos Coloma, was the Bishop of Barcelona from 1599 until 1603.

29.5.27 His Stay in Tournai 1602-1604

The Parish of Mary Magdalene in Tournai, long after the dissolution of the Knights Templar, remained a significant emblem of the Templar legacy. Established by the Templars during the height of their influence in medieval Europe, this church embodied the spiritual and social endeavors of the order. Renowned for their role in the Crusades and their extensive network of monastic communities, the Templars left an indelible mark on the regions they touched. By the early 17th century, the vestiges of Templar influence continued to attract individuals like Jeroni Desclergue, whose familial ties to the Templars and personal affinities drew him to the Parish of Mary Magdalene during his stay in Tournai from 1602 to 1604.

The Knights Templar established numerous religious and medical institutions throughout Europe and the Holy Land. Their founding of churches and hospitals often served both spiritual and practical purposes, providing sanctuaries for pilgrims and support for local communities. The Parish of Mary Magdalene in Tournai, believed to have been founded by the Templars, exemplifies this dual mission. Its dedication to Mary Magdalene, a figure revered by the Templars for her symbolic connection to penance and redemption, underscores the order's spiritual aspirations.

Jeroni Desclergue's stay in Tournai was marked by his profound connection to the Parish of Mary Magdalene, a church steeped in Templar history. His decision to link himself with this parish was influenced by his familial ties to the Templars and the enduring appeal of the Templar legacy in the early 17th century. As a relic of Templar influence, the Parish of Mary Magdalene provided Jeroni with a meaningful and inspiring environment, reflecting the enduring power of the Templars' spiritual and cultural contributions. Likely, it inspired him to join the military efforts to liberate Ostend, a task that would lead to his death in 1604.

As detailed in Chapter 29.5.26, the arrival of Felipa de Montoya in Tournai in June 1602 marks a significant event in our historical narrative. This was a time when Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) had returned to Barcelona to fulfill his duty of recruiting soldiers before his eventual return to Flanders. The Flight from Egypt panel, depicted in Figure 49.76 on page 1014, and described in Chapter 49.4.3.4 on page 990, brought by Antoni Desclergue (DC06) from Spain to Flanders, is believed to reference this event in his early life, when his mother, Felipa, fled Spain with her brother and child. This intriguing event sets the stage for our further exploration.

At that time, the Spanish Road, described in Chapter 8.10, ran from Milan to Mea, Aoste, Bourg-St-Maurice, Pont de Gressin, St Claude, Champagnole, Baume-les-Dames, Epinal, Luxemburg, Namur, Brussels. Alternatively, it ran from Milan to Lugano, Bedinzona, St Gottard, Luzern, Baden, Rupt-Sur-Moselle, Epinal, Nancy, Luxemburg, Namur, Brussels.

The return of Jeroni Desclergue and Felipa de Montoya in 1602 is not just a mere mention in our research. It is substantiated by several documents meticulously preserved in Kortrijk, as shown in Figure 29.114 on page 421, and Figure 29.115 on page 421. This careful documentation ensures the accuracy and reliability of our historical findings.

The specific order to recruit soldiers was given by H.M. King Felipe III of Spain on June 2, 1602. The soldiers, once recruited, were dispatched from Barcelona harbor on December 12, 1602. It is worth noting the dedication and service of Jeroni (DC05) in this process. He was back in Belgium before the Spring of 1603, having taken the route via Milan, Lorraine, to Belgium, as per his duty.

The fragment shown in Figure 29.102 states that when Jeroni, thanks to the influence of the Viceroy the Duke of Feria, went to the Royal court on June 2, 1602, he was requested by His Majesty to recruit 250 infantry soldiers, a request that was later formalized in a patent at Valladolid on September 28, 1602.

The fragment in Figure 29.103 states that the Viceroy, the Duke of Feria, pointed out that Jeroni should only recruit soldiers in Villa-Franca, Panedes, Tarragona, Tortosa, Montblanc, Lerida, Tarrega, and Cervera. The soldiers were dispatched from Barcelona on December 12, 1602.

The passage in Figure 29.104 states that Jeroni Desclergue returned to Flanders once his recruiting task ended. He commanded the Spanish infantry company of the Tercio of Maestre de Campo Don Iñigo de Borja and arrived in 1603. Evidence is found in the records of Acencia, the accountant of His Majesty in Flanders, on June 26, 1603.

As described above, Jeroni began a civil career in early 1598 in Tournai before going to Barcelona. He likely lived in a home similar to the one shown in Figure 29.107.

After the family's return from Spain in 1602-1603, Jeroni and his family stayed in Tournai again. Although Jeroni's son Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was born in Barcelona, he was baptized and raised the first years of his life in Tournai, near the Maria Magdalena church, shown in Figure 29.106 and on the map in Figure 29.108. The church is located in the northwest corner of the city, near the old city walls, and the gate to the town is on the Schelde River. It is the closest church of Tournai to Kortrijk and Harelbeke-Deerlijk. Later, after the death of Jeroni, his widow Felipa would return to Tournai to have their second son Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) baptized in Tournai's emblem of the Knight Templar on September 30, 1605, on the celebration day of Saint Hieronymus, in honor of the father Jeroni (DC05).

In the parish of Marie-Magdalena at Tournai, where Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) resided, we have found a few other Spanish and Italian families too. A couple of instances are given below.

Martin Ruis, born on November 11, 1599, folio 27; Francesc Degrado ('François Decrado'), born on June 2, 1601, folio 42; Maria Moreña ('Marie Moregne'), born on november 13, 1601, folio 46; Jacobo Boyana ('Jaques Boyana'), born on December 23, 1603, folio 69; Miguel Credo ('Michel Credo'), born on May 18, 1605, folio 83; Francesc Boyana ('François Boyava'), born on December 21, 1606, folio 97; Simon Moreña ('Simon Morengue'), born on April 8, 1637, folio 145.

29.5.28 His Participation in the Siege of Ostend 1602-1604

After the family's return from Spain and their subsequent stay in Tournai, Jeroni was summoned to duty in the summer of 1603 to assist in the liberation of Ostend. At that time, Ostend was occupied by English and Dutch forces, posing a significant threat to the safety of Flanders and the well-being of its residents.

A detailed description is given in Chapter 30.6 and Chapter 31.

In August 1603, he commanded, as a captain, a Tercio infantry company of Iñigo de Borja. With this company, he participated in the Siege of Ostend. This Siege lasted from August 1601 until September 27, 1604. Unfortunately, Jeroni died at Oostende on September 4, 1604.[65] He was killed by an exploding mine with half of his company while leading an assault.

The Siege of Ostend cost around 50000 deaths on both sides. In attempts to break through the defensive walls, mines were prevalent during the siege. Ostend was an island, and assaults only occurred during low tide. Ostend's battle was a war between Ambrogio Spinola on the Spanish side and Maurits van Oranje on the side of the Dutch States.

Íñigo de Borja Aragón y Velasco (Gandía, 1575 - Brussels, October 31, 1622) was a Spanish nobleman of the House of Borja; he was military, knight of the Order of Santiago and commander of Membrilla in that order. In 1595, he participated as a Spanish infantry soldier in Flanders in the war against France. De Borja went to Flanders in 1603, leading a Tercio of infantry of the Spanish army, consisting of several experienced companies from the Tercio of Lombardy and others from Spain.

After coming to the aid of Balduque ('s Hertogenbosch) in North Brabant, he handed over the Tercio in Ostend, granting another vacant command as described in a further chapter. De Borja would control the departmental Tercio of Holland stationed in Antwerp after the truce between Spain and the Northern Netherlands was signed in April 1609.

We may assume that Antoni Desclergue (DC06), son of Jeroni (DC05), has always associated the Siege of Ostend and his father's death with the presence of a supernova in the sky during the disaster, shown in Figure 29.109. Indeed, when Jeroni died in 1604 from a mine blast, coincidently, an event in the sky occurred, supernova SN 1604, first observed by Brunowski and Johannes Keppler, of which one can still watch the remains.

A church tower, also there during the Siege, can still be found in Ostend and is shown in Figure 29.117.

Donde ſe deſcrime la region de Flandes, y ſuceſsion de los ſeñores y Condes deſte Eſtado, progenitores del Rey don Felipe.

FLandes por algunos Autores es contada por Prouincia de Alemaña,y por otros de Francia , como ya queda dicho, poniendola en la Galia Belgica. Su aſſiento es en las marinas Septentrionales del Oceano, teniendo al Oriente a Alemaña, al Septentrion a Inglaterra,al Ocidente al mar de Francia , y al medio dia a Borgoña y la Galia Senonẽſe. No es la tierra grãde , pero vna de las inſignes regiones que ay en el orbe , llena de grandes y nobles pueblos,abundante de paſtos y ganados, y rios nauegables,rica de mercadurias y grãdes comercios de todos tratos,y ſobre todo de paños.La gente hermoſa y muy diſpueſta,amiga de viuir en mucha libertad, por lo qual a vezes mal ſufrida a ſus Principes.Eſta Prouincia haſta los tiempos del Emperador Carlos Magno,y aun muchos años deſpues, ſe tiene por cierto auer ſido tierra de floreſtas , paſtos , y monteria ; ſin ninguna grande poblacion. En ſu tiempo vn hombre natural de la meſma tierra, llamado Liderico,o Luderico, que habitaua en vna aldea,y pequeña poblacion, llamada Harlebeca , refieren algunos Autores, auer caſado con vna muger , natural de Alemaña,llamada Flandra,de cuyo nombre,eſcriuen auer tomado aquella Prouincia el nombre de Flandres, que comunmẽte los Eſpañoles quitando la R dizen Flandes , aunque otros no tienen eſta denominacion por autentica , y porque Flandes eſtà en la vnion de la Corona Real de Caſtilla,y lo meſmo haze Borgoña , trataremos de ſus coſas algo mas copioſo,que de lo de Alemaña,Habsburg y Auſtria , aunque la diferencia ſerà poca.El Emperador Carlos Magno , Rey de Alemaña y Francia,eſcriuen auer dado eſta Prouincia a eſte Liderico,hijo de Eſtoredo,en el año del nacimiento de nueſtro Señor de ſetecientos y nouenta y dos , aun no ſiendo Emperador, para que la tuuieſſe y guardaſſe de inſultos y maleficios de gentes que en ella ſe ſolian recoger , reſultando deſto ſer Liderico poſſeedor de Flandes.

El qual auiendo diez y ſeys años gouernado aquel miniſterio , fallecio cerca del año de ochocientos y ocho , y fue enterrado en Harlebeca.

Englerano, a quien otros llaman Ingecamo,tambien vnico deſte nombre, ſucedio a Liderico ſu padre en el dicho tiempo,y poblando en Flandes muchos lugares en diuerſas partes, tuuo vn hijo , llamado Odoacer , que le fue ſuceſſor , y auiendo diez y ſeys años gouernado la tierra , fallecio cerca del año de ochocientos y veynte y quatro en Harlebeca , donde fue enterrado.

Constructed around 1140, the octagonal chapel features a centralized plan influenced by Carolingian architecture and the now-lost funerary chapel of the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Vincent de Laon. Its design parallels that of the contemporary Basilica of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem and served as a model for the slightly later Templar chapel in Metz in Chapter 17.4.2.*

Figure 29.116: The Cathedral of Notre-Dame de Tournai, located in the heart of Tournai, Belgium, is a distinguished Catholic edifice renowned for its architectural and historical significance. Consecrated in 1171, this monumental structure seamlessly integrates Romanesque and Gothic styles, reflecting the architectural evolution of medieval Europe. Its vast dimensions—134 meters in length and 67 meters across the transept, with five towers, the tallest reaching 83 meters—exemplify the grandeur of Scaldian Gothic architecture, earning it a place on the UNESCO World Heritage list in 2000. The cathedral's site has hosted three successive cathedrals since the 5th century, the earliest founded by Saint Eleutherius. The current building commenced in the early 12th century, driven by the city's prosperity and ecclesiastical ambitions. Significant milestones include the completion of the Romanesque nave and transept in 1171 and the Gothic choir's dedication in 1255, influenced by the cathedrals of Amiens and Soissons. Despite extensive damage during the iconoclastic fury of 1566 and the French Revolution, the cathedral has undergone numerous restorations. The most recent stabilization efforts followed a tornado in 1999, highlighting the structure's fragility. Notre-Dame de Tournai stands as a testament to religious devotion, architectural mastery, and historical endurance, symbolizing the resilience and grandeur of medieval craftsmanship and continuing to be a focal point of Belgium's cultural and spiritual heritage.

29.6 The Events after Jeroni's Death in 1604

Juana Desclergue (DC06c) was born in 1588 and is described in Chapter 29.9.1, Anna Desclergue (DC06f) wa born in 1595 and is described in Chapter 29.9.3, and Antoni Desclergue (DC06) is described in Chapter 34 and Chapter 49. He also left an unborn child, Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), described in Chapter 29.9.6.

Miguel (DC06b) was born in 1605. The widow, Felipa de Montoya, waited to baptize the child until September 30, 1605, because this was the day of Saint Hieronymus and possibly even the birthday of Jeroni (DC05). The baptism occurred at Tournai in the Mary Magdalene church.[66]

As described in Chapter 29.8.2 and Chapter 34.13.7, the family Jeroni Desclergue & Felipa de Montoya were friends with the family of Jan Declercq (DK03) and Isabeau Braye. The latter died in 1622, and her widower, Jan Declercq, would marry Jeroni 's widow, Felipa de Montoya. The couple had property at Deerlijk as described in Chapter 34.13.7. The families had been acquainted when Jeroni resided in Kortrijk and Tournai because of their similar social status and probable family ties through the Desclergues branch of Manresa.[67]

In subsequent chapters, the descendants of Jeroni Desclergue are described. In Chapter 34.13.7, the descendants of Jan Declercq, the second husband of Felipa de Montoya,[68] are described.[69] The reference fragment in Figure 29.118 unveils a captivating chapter of history. It reveals that Captain Jeroni Desclergue, a figure of great importance, served His Majesty for approximately 17 years, from 1587 until the year 1604. His service was abruptly halted when he led an attack on the harbor town of Ostend and was knocked out by a mine. This significant event was certified by his Majesty, his Serene Highness Cardinal and Archduke Albert, in Brussels, on January 10, 1606.

29.7 The Spaniard Castle of Ghent

Some essential strongholds protected the 'Land van Waas' ('Pays de Vas'), such as Damme and Ghent. It's evident that the Desclergues passed or temporarily resided in both places.

Although Jeroni (DC05) and his wife Felipa de Montoya only resided briefly at the Spaniard Castle in Ghent at the beginning of their stay in Flanders and had only one child, Juana (DC06c), born there, a link always remained. Indeed, the castle was de facto the Spanish military headquarters in the region and functioned as a haven should it ever have been required. The author has good memories of his PhD at Ghent, as seen in Figure 29.119.

Several accessible sources exist on the history of the Spaniard Castle of Gent. We have based the current section mostly on the work of Audooren and De Zutter[70]. It's essential to provide some context about this castle since it appears in subsequent chapters related to Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and his son Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

H.M. Emperor Carlos V (Keizer Karel) was born in Ghent and ordered a castle, shown in Figure 29.121, for strategic reasons. The construction coincided with a period of oppression by his regime of the people of Ghent. The fort was called 'Castrum Novum.' Its construction began on May 12, 1540, and a few thousand workers finished the job in 1545. The castle could house a maximum of 2500 persons and exist for 300 years.

Nowadays, only a few remain, and the street plan mostly confirms the castle's existence at that location in Ghent. Accurate historical research has revealed that Charles Quint did not hastily decide to fortify the place. Plans already existed, made by the Burgundians, e.g., Charles the Bold. The Spaniards soon integrated their Castrum Novum into the city walls fortifications, and even Alessandro Farnese modernized it between 1589 and 1593. Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) was already in Belgium and resided at the castle before its upgrade. After significant improvements, it was no longer a 'Castrum Novum' but received the name 'Spaniard Castle.'

The castle was built strategically, close to where the Leie and Schelde Rivers, two highways at the time, joined, surrounded by either waterways or lands that could be easily flooded to repel the enemy. Also, the castle, which was to be inhabited mainly by the [66] The Mary Magdalene church had historical links with the Knights Templar and was the parish where the family had resided since 1602.

[67] This cannot (yet) be proven but is a possibility based on the prevalence of the name 'Nicolas' in this Declercq family of Kortrijk and the Desclergue family of Manresa and their similarity in name and social standing, being notaries, clergy and tradesmen.

[68] Felipa de Montoya is also known as Felipa de Toy or du Thoo

[69] The reader seeking to replicate this genealogical investigation will inevitably encounter these descendants, often having similar names, and may experience considerable confusion. To avoid errors, it is essential to study each cluster and sub-cluster comprehensively, adhering strictly to the correct timeline. In this endeavor, one must proceed with pragmatism, conservatism, diligence, and utmost caution. Furthermore, the investigation should extend beyond ecclesiastical records and bourgeois lists to include notarial documents for enhanced clarity. Crucial insights often lie in the minutiae, such as subtle variations in spelling by priests or non-overlapping clusters. Attention to these details is imperative for accurate genealogical research.

Spanish military, priests, and officials, could control Ghent's city and protect it adequately. The Castrum Novum was constructed simultaneously with the Citadel of Cambrai. Both works were closely supervised by H.M Emperor Carlos V personally rather than Brussels' local central government. The reader can find the importance of Ghent and Cambrai in the Desclergues' lives throughout the current book. For apparent reasons, the Spanish provided the fortress with homes, shelters, foundries, gunpowder mills, and wells.

During a short period, Ghent's town was in the hands of Calvinists, and so was the castle. It was in 1584 that the city returned to Spanish hands under Alessandro Farnese. It was soon after that date that Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) arrived in Belgium. In the 17th century, the Spaniard castle population consisted mainly of the Spanish military with their families. They had a job inside the castle but lived elsewhere in Flanders. The court was like a Spanish village, surrounded by fortifications.

The person in charge of the castle was named 'castellan' and was like a local governor nominated by His Majesty. For instance, Juan de Aranda became the castellan in 1610, during the time of Felipe III. Before him, it was de Herrera who served as castellan. The castellan of Ghent's castle was considered equally important as the one at Antwerp and the one at Cambrai. During his absence, he was replaced by a lower rank military, e.g., Juan de Inestrossa, Pedro Lopez de Haro, or Captain Francisco Morgado Ossario. Other governors would be Luis de Villar and Gaspar de Valdes, shown in Figure 29.120.

The minimum number of Spanish military was 100, but it could house 2500. One assumes that, on average, about 1000 people resided there, primarily military, with their families, former military, and even artisans. It is believed that there were hardly ever less than 600 active militaries.

Furthermore, it is known that contrary to other places, the castles of Ghent and Cambrai only counted Spanish soldiers of Hispanic origin.

It was forbidden to house non-Hispanic soldiers. However, in most periods, this law was only enforced for the higher military ranks, while ordinary soldiers could also have other nationalities, very likely with close ties to Spanish nationals. There were also numerous widows of killed soldiers. There were traditional brick homes for permanent (Spanish) inhabitants. Still, depending on the needs, the military authorities built innumerable barracks to house the excess soldiers and their families when needed.

As mentioned earlier, it is also known and mentioned in the book that many regular and higher military had extra earnings by renting out real estate. Such was done mainly by the soldiers who resided in Ghent's city to have a more regular life. The Spanish had good reasons for admiring the town. Ghent is still a beautiful city; some impressions are shown in Figure 29.122.

The parish of the Spaniard Castle was rather particular. It did not belong to Ghent, which was not uncommon because the military typically had their chapels, but the one in Ghent lasted for a very long period, so one would expect it to belong to the city.

There was a church, but this church lacked sources of income and was miserable. In the beginning, Spanish soldiers preferred not to be buried in the church but in a nearby abbey. However, the church would slightly improve in the early decades of the 1600s and receive higher prestige. Interestingly, the church of the citadel was devoted to Mary of Scherpenheuvel. We refer the reader to Chapter 49 on constructing a chapel at Deerlijk in 1639-1641 under the aegis of Antoni Desclergue, with financial input from Marguerite Kelduwier, which would be called Kapel-ter-Ruste. The Chapel indeed shared a legend with similarities to that of Scherpenheuvel. 'Maria van Scherpenheuvel' played nearly as important a role as Santiago in Spain. When the Spanish conquered Ostend in 1604, the victory was attributed to the Mary of Scherpenheuvel.

29.8.1 The Friendship between the Desclergue, Du Puich, Masse, Declercq, de Bucqouy, Vosse, Andries and de la Cruz families

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), the son of a notary in Montblanc, Spain, did not follow the traditional inheritance path. His brother Francesc was the heir of the family. Instead, he pursued a military career, viewing his time in Flanders as a strategic opportunity to forge valuable connections and advance within the military and administrative hierarchy.

The structure and operations of the Spanish army during this period differed significantly from modern military organizations. Regular salaries were uncommon, often leading soldiers to resort to theft from the local populace. Compensation was typically disbursed following successful missions or upon completing a term of service. Occasionally, local authorities were responsible for providing wages, while citizens were sometimes required to supply food and lodging for soldiers as a form of taxation. These aspects are frequently emphasized in historical accounts of Belgium and the Netherlands.

However, the situation was more intricate and nuanced than commonly portrayed. Military leaders often acted as financiers for their soldiers. For instance, a captain with financial resources might lend money to his troops to be repaid once they receive their salaries. It was not uncommon for such leaders to borrow funds from local inhabitants to ensure their soldiers were paid, subsequently repaying these loans. This created a complex economic network that influenced the social structure and vice versa. Additionally, the military was not perpetually engaged in siege warfare or combat. Long, peaceful winters allowed soldiers to house their families in barracks or, if financially able, to purchase or rent decent accommodations in towns or nearby villages.

Within this context, substantial evidence exists of the close friendships and connections between Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and several other families. These relationships persisted for over a century, frequently appearing in the lives of Jeroni and his descendants, reflecting the enduring social bonds forged during his military tenure in Flanders.

29.8.2 Jan Declercq (DK03)

There is a separate Chapter 34.13.7, devoted to Jan Declercq (DK03) because he has significantly impacted Jeroni 's children. Indeed, after Jeroni died in 1604, Jan, also a widower, married Jeroni's widow Felipa de Montoya in 1611. Figure 29.124 shows the families acquainted in Kortrijk. Jeroni found in Jan Declercq (DK03) a business partner and a friend of similar standing.

Jan Declercq (DK03) belonged to a dynasty of notaries in Kortrijk, shown in Figure 29.123 on page 425, somewhat similar to Jeroni's family's dynasty of notaries in Spain. Chapter 34.13 gives more information about this clan.

29.8.3 The du Puich family

Some etymology is necessary. Dupuy or Du Puich comes from 'puy' or 'puich,' which means 'a well' in old French. The term 'Putier' comes from 'puer,' which means 'to stink' or 'to smell.' Names often switch language depending on the region where they are used. A French person, 'Du Puich' is, in Flanders, customarily named 'Vandeputte.' When Spanish necessarily translated the word back to French or Spanish, they could opt for 'Putier,' which has the exact origin as 'Putte' and comes from 'Puer.' The translation was necessary because 'Putte' was too close to the Spanish word 'Puta,' which nobody wanted for a name. Thus, the names Du Puich, Vandeputte, and Putier are equivalent and were interchanged in the Spanish period in Flanders when the region still contained the French Flemish areas that are nowadays located in the North of France.

The name 'Putier' existed in Burgundy and central France but was only found in Belgium at Ghent's Spaniard castle. For instance, in Figure 29.125, such records even referred to Lille's area where the family Du Puich resided.

29.8.3.1 Appearance of Jeroni Desclergue at Loos (near Lille) with du Puich

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) appeared at Loos, near Lille, in 1575-1605 at the abbey to visit Dom Pierre Carpentier. Guillaume du Puich (from Emmerin) had also appeared nine visits earlier during that period. It is essential to highlight that Marguerite Kelduwier, who financed the chapel described in Chapter 49, resided in Lille despite her roots in Deerlijk.

The encounters did not coincide, but they frequented the same place, indicating that both families had been acquainted around 1600. The observation is important because, as can be found in Chapter 34 and Chapter 49 concerning the construction of the Chapel at Deerlijk, the du Puich family is involved in the proprietary rights in the first century after its creation in 1639. Interestingly, the list of visitors also records the Castellany names from where the visitors from outside Lille came. Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) is listed there as 'Jerôme Leclercq, de Courtrai.'

Indeed, we know that Jeroni (DC05) lived at Kortrijk for a certain period, and we have found Jeroni at Kortrijk in different certificates. Also, Deerlijk belonged to the Castellany of Courtrai (Kortrijk). The account is found in Charles Liagre.[74] Although the referred book is not very specific about the year of the visit, we assume it must have been before 1599 when Jeroni temporarily returned to Spain to attend the Corts of 1599 in Barcelona. Note that the link with Loos, Lille, and nearby Wicres equally links Jeroni Desclergue to Jehan or Jean du Bois, husband of Marguerite Kelduwier, involved in establishing the Chapel at Deerlijk in 1639, as described in Chapter 49.

29.8.3.2 A marriage between the Du Puich and the Desclergue family

Several 'Du Puich' certificates are listed in this book in the description of the family 'Vandeputte - Declercq,' who were Jeroni's grandchildren. In particular, we refer to Chapter 37 and Part X.

29.8.3.3 The presence of the Du Puich family at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent

We refer first to Chapter 29.8.3 where we explained that the names Putier, Du Puich, and Vandeputte were equivalent in Flanders in the Spanish period.

Below are a couple of church certificates found at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent between 1611 and 1638, which is during the lifetime of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), son of Jeroni (DC05), and father of, among others, Maria Declercgz (DC08d) who would marry Egidius Du Puich (Egidius Vandeputte or Egidius Steenput) at Harelbeke in 1701.

The Putier family must have been Du Puich, which can also be found in the earliest certificate of 1611, in Figure 29.125. It states that on April 17, 1611, at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent, Miguel De Villanueva married Elisabeth Du Puich ('Isabel Putier'). It also says that Miguel was from Alcorissa (200 km South-West of Montblanc) in the archdiocese of Zaragosa and was a son of Bartolome de Villanueva and Leonor Peres; and that Isabel was a daughter of Antoine Du Puich ('Antonio Putier') and Maria Decorte ('Cortein') and that she originated from Haubourdin[75] ('Aburdin') 'in the land of Lille' (Lille = Rijsel in the North of France). No historical records indicate the existence of any 'Putier' at Haubourdin, but rather 'Du Puich' (or 'Dupuis').

Not all people linked to the Spaniard Castle lived inside its walls at Ghent, as indicated above. Many lived, for instance, in the nearby suburb of Sint Jacob (Gand Saint Jaques, or Santiago de la Villa de Gante) and were buried there, even if the funeral occurred in the Castle. An example is shown in Figure 29.126, of Justina Putier.

There is also evidence that the Du Puich family married Spaniards and was actively involved in the military at Ghent. Indeed, in Figure 29.127, Alexandre du Puich ('Alexandro Putiers') was a corporal ('cabo de esquadra') in charge of a Luxemburg Tercio at the Castle. He was the son of Claude du Puich ('Glaudio Putier') and Jeanne or Juana. On May 28, 1619, he married Catalina Thomas at the Spaniard Castle of Gent; Lamberto Regi and Mieser Regi were witnesses.

Alexandre du Puich must have long connected with the Spaniard Castle of Gent. In 1631, on February 24, in Figure 29.128, he witnessed Martin Tendero and Catalina Schepens' wedding. The other witness was Juan Ruis (known to be the church's verger).

One can find in Figure 29.128 that Alexandre du Puich had witnessed Martin Tendero's wedding in 1631. In 1635, in Figure 29.129, he served as a witness on Jusepe Tendero and Isabella Varga's marriage on October 7. The witnesses were Pedro Ortiz ('Pedro Hortiz'), Alexandre Du Puich ('Alexandro Putiers'), and others.

In 1638, in Figure 29.130, we also found in Ghent at the same Castle the wedding of Francisco Tiry and Bartolomène du Puich ('Bartholomina Putiers'). She may have been Alexandre's sister.

29.8.3.4 A marriage between de Bucqouy and the Desclergue families, with Du Puich as a witness

Another example of a soldier from the Spaniard castle of Ghent marrying someone from the nearby Santiago de la Villa de Gante (Gent Sint Jacobs) is shown in Figure 29.131. It concerns the wedding of Jose Desclergue and Jacomyne de Bucqouy (spelled as 'Bouchoute'). The banns took place in Santiago, while the wedding followed one month later at the castle. The Conde de Bucquoy led a regiment from Alsace in the Spanish army in the brigade led by the same, in the right-wing division led by Ernst Graf von Isenburg, in the Spanish army 's artillery Alvaro de Melo under the general command of Captain-General Don Francisco de Melo. The family probably also appears in Deerlijk in 1650, as shown in Chapter 34.6.3.

In Figures 29.131 and 29.132, on February 24, 1631, which is the same day as a wedding referred to above, where Alexandro Putiers was a witness, we find, again at the Spaniard castle, that the same persons witnessed the marriage of Jose Desclergue and Jacomina de Bucqouy.
Jose was likely a son of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b), brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The referred records are also shown in Chapter 32. Because we have not found later records, we assume that he must have died in battle.
As can be found in Chapter 32, Jose Desclergue had first been married to an Irish Gertrude Cobain in 1629 at Wingene. She must have died soon after they married, perhaps during childbirth.

29.8.3.5 His post-mortem influence on the realization of the Chapel in Deerlijk

Here, we present some globally known facts about the chapel 'Kapel-ter-Ruste' in Deerlijk that will be extensively outlined in Chapter 34 and Chapter 49. The chapel was constructed in 1639 with the financial support of Marguerite Kelduwier but under the aegis of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), who considered the chapel a tribute to his father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The foundation was based on a miracle in which everyone involved was closely acquainted with Antoni Desclergue (DC06). Antoni also brought a retable from Spain that included a panel showing the Main Square of Montblanc. On another panel, he placed his initials 'Antoni Desclergue, caballero del Rey Felipe,' and brought a statuette back from Spain, made by Alonso Cano.
Still, the family of Du Puich also appears in the surviving documents of a couple of decades later. Indeed, in the case of the Chapel at Deerlijk, the following patrons have been found in the archives: Eugene Lamoral du Bois (1754), who was the Lord of Chocques (nowadays in Northern France) and was an heir of Marguerite de Le Quellerye (Kelduwier), widow of Jean du Bois who was the great grandfather of Eugene Lamoral du Bois. We have found records in Northern France of Eugene Lamoral du Bois (Seigneur de Chocques et de Sebbe 1659-1702), married to Marie Waresquiel (Dame de Thérissart en Avelin 1651-1719). Their daughter was Marie Eugenie du Bois (Dame de Sebbe et de Chocques), who died on August 28, 1723, at Béthune in Northern France. She married Jacques François Du Puich in 1706, and they had several children, including Antoine François Joseph Du Puich (Ecuyer, seigneur de Mesplau, de Maurepas, 1707-1766). The latter signed the chapel's patronage in Deerlijk in 1753-1755, which is how the Chapel Patronage arrived in the Du Puich family, which is not surprising, given the known connections between the two families throughout the 17th century. Note, again, that Du Puich is also spelled as Dupuis and, in Flemish, even as Vandeputte. It was in 1701 that Maria Declercgz (DC08d), granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), married Egidius Vandeputte (Gilles Du Puich), son of Mathias Vandeputte (Mathieu De Puich) and Joanna Van Rumbeke.
They were related to the above-mentioned Du Puich family and were found in Cambrai (as Bourgeois) in the 1600s. This is important because we know that Antoni Desclergue (DC06), or his brother Jeroni Desclergue (DC06c), described in 29.9.5, donated to the Saint-Jean hospital in 1641. Further links with the Van Rumbeke family are found in Chapter 48.5.2.

29.8.4 The Masse family

On several occasions, there are links with the Masse family. We specifically refer to Part X. Genetic analysis is shown in Chapter 73.10.3.17. The family name Maes is relatively common in Belgium. Therefore, one who has the name Masse will almost automatically be called Maes on church certificates, except perhaps in purely Spanish communities, as shown in Figure 29.133.
Antoni Maz ('Massa') died at Ostend on January 1, 1702.[76] He was a merchant and was also found at Harelbeke in 1613, in Figure 29.134, when his daughter Maria Maz was baptized there.
In the early 18th century, we still find relics of old Maz families with totally transformed family names, such as in Figure 29.135.

29.8.5 The de Vos Family

Several connections have been found between the Desclergues and the family De Vos. Examples are given in Chapter 34.5.13. Late in the 17th century, we find Antoni de Pedrolo (DC05ex1y2y1) of Montblanc in Spain, who married Maria Anna de Poch or De Vos before he married Jerònia de Folcràs in 1693. This Maria Anna de Poch was the daughter of Joan de Poch (Joannes De Vos), who was born in Harelbeke in Belgium in 1633 as the son of Pere Llorenç de Poch (Petrus Laurentius De Vos) and Isabella Verscheure, and who died there in 1708, and of Maria Anna Portea y Roure, his first wife.
Joan De Vos married in a second marriage to Joana Declercgz (DC08b), a union that resulted in the maternal Desclergue branch described in Part X. Joana Declercgz (DC08b) was a daughter of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina Vercruyce (Ximenes de la Cruz) and, therefore, a great-granddaughter of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06).
At the Spaniard Castle of Ghent, for instance, we found in 1634 the wedding of Diego de Vossa and Clara de Castro, shown in Figure 29.136. Diego was a 'Sargento' in the company of Don Gaspar de Valdes. The witnesses were Juan Ruiz and Manriques, also described in Chapter 29.5.4, a 'vaandrig' (alferez). Manrique's company had also been the one of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Carlos Coloma de Saa.
Note that Sergeant Major Gaspar de Valdés died in the naval 'Battle of the Dunes of Dover' in 1639. His brother was Captain Baltasar de Valdés, who died in May of 1639, fighting in Flanders against the French. Diego de Vossa, or Jacobus de Poch, may have been Pere Llorenç de Poch's brother, an ancestor along with our maternal Desclergue ancestry. It is also noteworthy that at Wingene, there was a baptism of Petronella Desclergue, granddaughter of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) (brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05)), for whom Joannes de Vos acted as godfather, described in Chapter 32.
Figure 29.137 is the baptism of Anna De Vos at Sint Anna in Bruges on January 6, 1649. Interestingly, this baptism is inserted in Bruges's 'Spanish Register' in the transcripts of Belgium's National Archives and the old parish lists. Further research would be required to understand the latter, but somehow, whoever formed those registers must have associated this family with the Spanish or a separate Spanish record on which baptisms were copied from the Bruges' Spanish community.
These families probably lived in the city but had not yet become Burghers (Poorters, or Bourgeois). The 'Spanish register' names are listed in Chapter 71.4.3. They include 'De Vos,' which possibly means that the 'De Vos' family indicated, was of Spanish origin (Vossa, e.g.) and had not yet received the city's burgher (bourgeois) status.
It appears that Gaspar De Vos was a son of Germin De Vos, as found in his marriage in Sint Kruis Bruges (Bruges Santa Cruz) on January 11, 1633, in Figure 29.138.

29.8.6 The de la Cruz Family, related to Jeroni's Wife

There is an extensive Chapter 37.4, devoted to the family of (Ximenez) de la Cruz when the wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC07) is described in Chapter 37. Antoni (DC07) was a grandson of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and a son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

The links return to around 1600, so they must have originated with Jeroni (DC05). For instance, Martina de la Cruz's family was related to Felipa de Montoya through marriage between Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz and Maria de Montoya in 1596. We assume that the latter was Felipa de Montoya's sister and, therefore, sister-in-law of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). We also found, for instance, Jeroni's daughter Juana Desclergue (DC06c) acting as godmother at the Spaniard Castle to Alonso Ximenez de la Cruz, as shown in Chapter 29.9.1. We also find Maria Juana Pollet appearing several times as a witness in the extended family at weddings and baptisms. She married Juan Ximenes from Cascante in Tarazona at the Spaniard castle of Ghent in 1697 and is described in Chapter 32.6.

29.8.7 The Andries Family

Adriaan Andries who was a bailiff of Kortrijk. We found a church record at Kortrijk in 1591 linking Jeroni Desclergue[77] to Laurentia Andries, daughter of the bailiff.

In 1578, for instance, Kortrijk was governed by Jan van Damme (mayor) and bailiffs Joost Van den Berghe, Jan de Bouchengien, Lodewijk van de Gheenste, Jacob van der Varent, Joost van Baelberghe, Oste Beert, Adriaan Andries, Jacob de Wargny, Joost Eelboo and Jan Bogaert.[78] This occurred when the town had been occupied by Calvinists, who enforced a local government of notables of the city. Some were Catholics; others were Calvinists and had volunteered to defend the citizens' rights under the new regime. A grandson, also called Adriaan Andries, would, in 1666, establish a chapel in Deerlijk where we find the parish of Sint Lodewijk (Saint Louis). The chapel was transformed into a church and is located within walking distance from the area where Jeroni's sons Antoni and Miguel would grow up with their mother after the death of their father. A description is given in Chapter 50.

Adriaan Andries, as referred to in 1578, had been selected from a crowd of electable notables, including Jacob and Jan de Muelenare, Jacob Pollet, Wouter and Frans Waeye, Nicolas van Dale, Pieter de Costere and Denis van der Gracht. The reader who digests the entire book will encounter several names in different chapters related to Benoit, de Patin, and Desclergue.

We can also refer to the baptism in Figure 29.139, in 1593, at Kortrijk, of Joos Andries, for whom Jeroni Desclergue (DC06) served as godfather.

29.9 Jeroni's children

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya had the following children:

Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) would become a priest and did not inherit when his mother died in 1628 because he must have received his proper share at the commencement of his priesthood. He is described in Chapter 29.9.5.

Juana Desclergue (DC06c) was born at the Spaniard Castle in Ghent in 1588. She died there in 1622. She is described in Chapter 29.9.1. Maria Desclergue (DC06e) was baptized at Kortrijk on May 29, 1592. She died in childhood. She is described in Chapter 29.9.2.

Anna Desclergue (Dc06f), born at Kortrijk in 1595. She married Vincentius Staelens in 1620 at Waregem, had four children, who all died young, and she died in Ostend in 1627. She is described in Chapter 29.9.3.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was born in Barcelona and baptized in Tournai in 1602. He married Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) before 1624 and had five children. He is described in Chapter 34 and Chapter 49.

After his father's death, Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), described in Chapter 29.9.6, was baptized at Tournai in 1605 on Saint Hieronymus's day (Jeroni). Miguel died in 1650.

29.9.1 Juana Desclergue (DC06c), the Daughter of Jeroni Joan Desclergue

Juana Desclergue (DC06c) was born at the Spaniard Castle in Ghent in 1588, at the beginning of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya's residence in Flanders. Later, they moved to Kortrijk.

Juana married a Spanish soldier, which must have been why, as an adult, she resided at the place of her birth in Ghent.

Juana (DC06c) visited the Spaniard castle regularly when she was young, together with her parents. There must have been seasons when she lived there with her mother and siblings while Jeroni (DC05) was on a military campaign against the Dutch.

Indeed, Ghent's Spaniard Castle was located on the strategic outpost where the Leie and Schelde Rivers come together. In the works describing Carlos Coloma's life, we read that Jeroni should most definitely have resided prolonged times at the castle in the period 1593-1594, and perhaps also in other periods. For instance, in the winter of 1596-1597, after military activities in the south, the focus turned to Hulst, where the Spanish would lay Siege in 1597. The authorities most likely coordinated this in Ghent. During the preparation time, the Desclergues may have stayed there.

Joanna (DC06c) appears as Godmother on baptisms in the period 1614-1617, as in Figures 29.140 and 29.141 on page 430 (or 37.82 on page 659). She died in 1622. Her death, in Figure 29.142, was very likely caused by disease as occurred so often at that time. Anyways, she had no offspring that survived her and had not been married.

When Alonso Ximenez de la Cruz was baptized at the Spaniard Castle in 1617 in Ghent, in Figure 29.141, his Godmother was Juana Desclergue (DC06c). His godfather was Don Alonso de Aranda. His parents were Juan Ximenez de la Cruz (perhaps an uncle of Martina De la Cruz, who would later marry Jeroni's grandson Antoni (DC07)) and Juana Mancera.

29.9.2 Maria Desclergue (DC06e), the Daughter of Jeroni Joan Desclergue

Maria Desclergue (DC06e) was the daughter of Jeroni Desclergue and Felipa De Montoya. She was baptized at Kortrijk in 1592 on May 29, as seen in Figure 29.143, at the Church of Saint Martin in Figure 29.144.

Several Gutierez persons were found during that period at San Felipe de Castilla's parish in Antwerp, seen in Figure 29.173 on page 435. Maria Anna Van der Schelden was the wife of Joannes Duermael or Dormael from Ghent. Duermael - Van der Schelden married at Ghent (Sint Martinus) in 1585 (Reg. 224 f. 14r), and this marriage was a Catholic confirmation of an earlier established Calvinistic marriage. We have found no further trace of Maria Desclergue and therefore assume that she died in childhood.

29.9.3 Anna Desclergue (DC06f), the Daughter of Jeroni Desclergue

Anna Desclergue (DC06f) was the daughter of Jeroni Desclergue and Felipa De Montoya. She was baptized at Kortrijk on January 13, 1595, as shown in Figure 29.145. Her Godmother was a descendant of Nicolas Declercq (DK01), described in Chapter 34.13.3.

When Jeroni (DC05) died in 1604, Anna (DC06f) was nine years old.

At 19, she appeared as Godmother to Guillermo Martin de Abera in Ghent. It means that she was probably already married then; hence, she likely had received, according to Catalan law, a dowry from her mother, which further excluded her from the inheritance of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya.

She married Vincent Stalins in Waregem in 1620, and her mother, Felipa de Montoya, was a witness. Vincent was a widower of Maria Deman and had been married to her in Waregem in 1609. Because Anna's (DC06f) related documents hold clues to the story of the chapel's construction 'Kapel-ter-Ruste' in Deerlijk, we present everything we found below.

Anna Desclergue (DC06f) appeared as Godmother in 1614 in Ghent at the Spaniard castle, in Figure 29.146.

Her future husband, Vincent Stalins, married first in Waregem on February 24, 1609, to Marie Deman, shown in Figure 29.147.

The couple Vincent Stalins and Marie Deman had children: Francisca, Adriana, and Petra.

Francisca Stalins was born in Waregem on January 26, 1611. Her godfather was Franciscus Stalins, and her Godmother was Beelke Debruine, daughter of Laurentius from Lendelede.

Adriana Stalins was born in Waregem on February 6, 1614. Her godfather was Judocus Putman, son of Judocus, and her Godmother was Adriana Svolders, wife of Oliverius Debels.

Petra Stalins was born in Waregem on August 16, 1617. Her godfather was Petrus Stalins, and her Godmother was Petra Van Lanckere. Marie Deman died between 1617 and 1620.

Vincent Stalins married Anna Desclergue (DC06f) at Waregem in 1620, in Figure 29.148. The couple had the following children: Franciscus, Anna, Joannes, and Petrus, who all died young. When Anna Desclergue (DC06f) married Vincentius Stalins in 1620 at Waregem, the witnesses were Joannes De Wilde and the bride's mother, Felipa De Montoya ('Philippa du Tooi'). Note that Joannes De Wilde probably also served as godfather 22 years later on the baptism of Florence Vermeersch at Harelbeke on March 20, 1642, together with godmother Florence Decostere.

Franciscus Stalins was baptized, in Figure 29.149, in Waregem on May 25, 1621. His godfather was Joannes Demets, and his Godmother was Arnolda Benoot.

Anna Stalins was baptized, in Figure 29.150, in Waregem on May 20, 1623. Her godfather was Judocus Joelle, and her Godmother was Georgia Van Gaete.

Joannes and Petrus Stalins were twins, born in Waregem on October 8, 1626. Joannes's godfather was Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

Anna Desclergue (DC06f) survived all her children and died without living offspring in Ostend, in 1627, where we found the burial of an 'Anna Desclergue,' shown in Figure 29.152. It was the same year and the same town where the marriage took place of Antoni De Pollo (Antonius Depoyo) and Catharina de Montoya, described in Chapter 29.10.12.4. Perhaps they were related.

Interestingly, in particular, in the context of the construction of a chapel at Deerlijk and the connection between the families Desclergue, de la Motte Baraffe, Du Bois, Keluwier, and Stalins, we list several important documents that, together with the ones above, indicate a link between those families.

There is a chance that Joannes Stalins, who married Joanna Keluwier ('Quellerie') at Sint Denijs (Zwevegem) in 1648, shown in Figure 29.153, was related to Anna Declercq (DC06f) through her husband.

We also retrieved a Judocus Keluwier and Elisabeth Stalins in Deerlijk on baptisms in 1643 and 1644, shown in Figures 29.154 and 29.155.

Furthermore, we found a marriage, in Figure 29.156, at Templeuve, 8 km South-East of Lille and 10 km South-West of Tournai, on July 22, 1640, between Jean Dubrucq and Catherine du Bois. Perhaps this concerns the same Jean Dubrucq found as godfather in 1626 in Waregem to a son of Anna Desclergue (DC06f) and Vincent Stalins, and possibly Catherine du Bois was related to Jean du Bois, husband of Marguerite Kelduwier. More than one Jean Dubrucq was found at Templeuve. Another one in the first half of the 17th century was Jean, a son of Philippe Dubrucq and married to Françoise du Bois. There is not enough evidence to form a link, though, with the husband of Margriet Keluwier or with the godfather mentioned in 1626.

Interestingly, in 1655, in Figure 29.156, an alliance is found between Isabelle Stalins and Philippe Albert la Motte Baraffe, son of Nicolas de la Motte Baraffe and Anne de Vicq. The latter was a relative of the one in Deerlijk, but we could not link Isabelle Stalins and Vincent Stalins. They may have been related, but we don't know. The lack of documents referring to Vincent Stalins darkens the obscurity.

Isabelle Stalins was the daughter of Egidius Stalins and Anne Marie de Scheppere, who had married in Oudenaarde on February 28, 1625. Egidius was a son of Egidius Senior, baptized at Ghent on August 31, 1599, as a son of Egidius Stalins and Isabelle Canin. He had the following siblings: Jacques Stalins, Jean Baptiste Stalins, Jeanne Albertine Stalins, and Catherine Stalins.

29.9.4 Antoni Desclergue (DC06), the Son of Jeroni Desclergue

He is our ancestor. We refer to Chapter 34 and Chapter 49.

29.9.5 Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d), the Son of Jeroni Desclergue

He became a priest before 1611 and received his inheritance from his biological father, Jeroni, before his mother, Felipa de Montoya, remarried. In Figure 29.172 on page 435, we can see that Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) was the son of Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05) and that he was a priest. After the death of his mother, Felipa de Montoya, in 1628, Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) transferred an annuity to another person on July 10, 1632. That interest originated from a transfer to Jeroni Desclergue's (Dc06b) stepfather, Jan Declercq (DK03), on November 1, 1615. Unlike Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) did not inherit the real estate from Felipa when she died in 1628, as he was a priest, who had been paid his legitima according to Spanish customs when he turned priest.

In early modern Catalonia, including Barcelona, around the 1600s, inheritance practices were influenced by regional customs and laws. One significant aspect was the handling of inheritance when a son became a priest. Traditionally, when a son entered the priesthood, he was often provided with a financial settlement or portion of the inheritance at the time of his ordination. This payment, known as a legítima, was a way to ensure that the priestly son would have financial support while also renouncing his claim to the family inheritance upon the parents' death.

The practice served dual purposes: it provided for the priestly son's immediate needs and ensured the remaining inheritance could be distributed among the other heirs without complication. This was rooted in the broader principles of inheritance laws in Catalonia, which emphasized equitable distribution among children while accommodating specific circumstances such as religious vocations or the appointment of an heir.

Catalonian inheritance law during this period was codified in the Usatges de Barcelona and later legal texts, which detailed the obligations and rights of heirs, including provisions for those entering religious orders.

29.9.6 Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), the Son of Jeroni Desclergue

One can read in Chapter 29.10.6 and Chapter 29.11 that Miguel's mother was Felipa De Montoya and that she died early in 1628, leaving Miguel as an orphan. It means that in 1628, Miguel must not have reached the age of 25 and was not yet married. In other words, he was born after 1603. His baptism confirms this.

He was baptized on September 30, 1605, in Figure 29.157. His father, Jeroni, died at Ostend on September 4, 1604. It means that Miguel must have been born before June 1605. His mother Felipa, a widow, however, waited to baptize Miguel until the celebration day of Saint Hieronymus ('Jeroni'), i.e., September 30[79].

A baptism a few months after birth was uncommon but also not exceptional. FamilySearch®, a system developed by the Mormons, recommends, for Spain, searching for baptisms between the day of birth and several months later because there are many examples of late Spanish baptisms. In the case of Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), we can see that his mother waited until the day of Saint Hieronymus, but she probably also wanted first to be purified so that, in the absence of the father, she could baptize her child. After childbirth, purification of mothers was a ritual that generally took place around six weeks after delivery but, given the circumstances, may also have occurred later.

There is research done in Spain, for instance, to determine the age of children when they were baptized.[80] The work states that, in principle, children were baptized as soon as suitable after birth. It was, however, a vague principle, and children were sometimes baptized months after they were born, for instance, to wait for the godfather's presence or any other reason, such as the priest's unavailability in some periods.

In Spain, and probably elsewhere in the Spanish Empire, the date of birth was added to the baptism certificate only starting from 1675 and became standard in Spain around 1700. Jean Delumeau[81] states the following about the late 17th century, i.e., several decades after Miguel's baptism in 1605:

The seventeenth century's synodal statutes tirelessly repeated the obligation to baptize children within three days of birth. If they did not fulfill this obligation, negligent parents could be prohibited from entering the Church. The Church strengthened control over midwives, certainly to limit the number of abortions, but also because of their obligation to baptize every newborn in danger of dying. The midwife, chosen by the village's female elite, took an oath before the priest and had to prove that she knew how to administer baptism. During the pastoral or archdeacon inspections, the visitor never failed to question her about it. Consultation of French parish records reveals that negligence in the administration of baptism became increasingly rare from the end of the 17th century. At the same time, the seriousness of the sacred ceremony was emphasized, excluding godfathers and godmothers who had not fulfilled their Easter obligations or who were 'not recommended because of their customs' and prohibiting the parade of volunteer bell ringers, who traditionally had the right to a small fee offered by the godparents.

Further in the paper by Josué Fonseca Montes, we find that despite all the attempts by the Church to ensure children were baptized as soon as possible after birth, even halfway through the 18th century, it still took an average of one week and a range from two days to almost three months for 'newborns' to be baptized, in the investigated villages in Spain. In other words, in 1605, waiting a few months was not dramatic.

It's also possible that his baptism was a re-baptism if the circumstances of a first baptism were not according to customs.

Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) was named after Saint Michael and was baptized on his father's name day in 1605. Michael does not only stand as a symbol for having defeated a dragon, comparable to the Spanish who conquered the Dutch at Ostend (September 22, 1604, with celebrations and a formal ceremonial entry by Albrecht and Isabelle on September 25), but we also know that the family lived at Fort Colombye near Ostend during the Siege, also known as the fortress of San Miguel (Sint Michiel) because there was such chapel there. After the Siege in September 1604, special services must have been held to thank Saint Michael in that chapel. For this reason, Felipa decided to name her last son Miguel.

Furthermore, the parish of the Desclergues in Montblanc, famous for the fact that it also served as the Corts location, was that of Saint Michael (San Miguel). When Miguel's brother Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) established the Chapel of Deerlijk, he would ensure that there would appear an image in the chapel of the Main Square of Montblanc, on which not only the Casa Desclergue would be depicted, but also the San Miguel church.

We do not find Miguel Desclergue until 1630, when he serves as Godfather, along with the Godmother Anne Declercq (DK03dyd), for Michael Declercq, son of Jan Declercq (DK03dya) and Jossynne Nooters, at Deerlijk.

Miguel married Maria Anna Louise le Vast, from Marquette near Lille (Marquette-lez-Lille), and the couple had two children, Bettemina and Louis, shown in Figure 29.162 on page 433 and Figure 29.163 on page 433 respectively. No further traces were found of the children, apart from a marriage at a young age of Bettemina in Cambrai in 1650 to a certain Legier, shown in Figure 29.171 on page 435; while Maria Anna Louise le Vast died before 1642.

We assume that Miguel was already in the military in 1635, and his bond with Marquette may have been due to these activities. Probably, he lived in Deerlijk but remained mobile. Having his children baptized in his wife's village of origin may be due to that mobility.

We have not found much more about Miguel, except that he became a 'outside burgher' ('bourgeois forain' , 'buitenpoorter') of Kortrijk while living in Deerlijk, in 1635, 1637-1638, 1648-1650, shown in Figures 29.165, 29.166, 29.167, 29.168, 29.169, 29.170. The gap between 1638 and 1648 was due to his career. His disappearance from 1650 onward may be related to his daughter in Cambrai.

In 1639, he became an artillerist for the Spanish forces at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent. There, he married Levina Cocx on May 6, 1642, in Figure 29.158 on page 433. The witnesses were Francisco Tiery and Pedro Desprets.

We found Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) as godfather on the baptism at Deerlijk in 1644 of Maria Declercq (DK03dybx5), daughter of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) and Joanna Depoorter. The priest wrote 'Decleqs' for Pieter Declercq's branch, while he wrote 'Michael Le Clercgs' for Miguel to show a difference.

We found him in 1644, in Figure 29.159 on page 433, as godfather in Deerlijk to Miguel del Beke, son of Paschalius del Beke and Laurentia Blomme, Godmother was Margareta del Beke; and as godfather, in Figure 29.160 on page 433, to Maria Declercq (DK03dybx5), daughter of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) and Joanna De Poorter ('Pootere').

In particular, the baptism in Figure 29.161 on page 433 is thought-provoking. The transcript of Figure 29.161 is as follows:

'Dezen 14den februari 1630 is heffen ghedaen Michael Declercq (DK03dyay3) ('Michael De Clerck, filius Jans') ende de moedere Jossyne Nooters, end de den peetere Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) ('Michael De Clerck') ende de meetere Anna Declercq (DK03dyd) ('Anne De Clerck filia (sic) Jans'); ende den selven daeghe ende van den daugter heffen ghedaen Jossina Declercq (DK03dyax2) ('Jossyne Declercq filia Jans') ende de moedere Jossyne Nooters en de den peetere Gillis Cotenye ende de meetere Margareta Maesseyts filia Joozyns.'

From the transcript, we can extract again that Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) (who serves as godfather) was not the natural son of Jan Declercq (DK03), unlike Anna Declercq (DK03dyd). Indeed, he was Jeroni Joan's (DC05) son, while Jan (DK03), father of Anna Declercq (DK03dyd), was his stepfather.

We do not know the exact date of the death of Miguel Desclergue (DC06b). However, we know that his widow Livina Cockx remarried, in Figure 29.164 on page 433, at Ghent, Sint Pieters, on July 24, 1660, to Philippus De Meeckere. From an orphan's deed and the records of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk, we know he must have died before 1651.

Like his brother Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Miguel has had access to the status of Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk. He appears on the list as 'Michael Declercq, filiastrum Jans' (referring to his stepfather Jan), or 'filius Jans,' referring to his natural father Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés. Note that a short delay in becoming a Bourgeois Forain was not against the law in Kortrijk. Indeed, he turned 25 in 1629, but that did not strictly mean adulthood immediately. One typically had to marry or emancipate as military, for instance. We can refer to

'Vlaems recht dat is costumen ende wetten ghedecreteert by de graven ende gravinnen van Vlaenderen waer by ghevoeght syn d' interpretatien, concessien Caroline, ordonnantien politique, hanseryen &c, 1674,' where we read that in most areas children became automatically adults at the age of 25, except in Kortrijk. Indeed, in Kortrijk, one remained a minor, even after 25, except through emancipation, marriage, or priesthood. The custom states

'Kinderen sijn ende blijven inde macht ende bedwanck van haerlieder vader ende moeder, al waert oock dat sy excedeerden de oudde van vijf-en-twintich jaren, ten ware dat sy by emancipatie, priesterschap, huwelick oft andere staten daert bij men naer rech sijn

selfs wordt, hun selfs bedeghen. Cortrycke rubrica 12. art. 9.'
Miguel Desclergue disappeared from the records in Deerlijk in 1650, which coincided with the birth of his grandchild in Cambrai from his daughter Bettemina Desclergue, who was underaged then. Indeed, Figure 29.171 on page 435 shows the baptism of Marie Anne Legier, the daughter of Bettemina Desclergue and a certain 'Legier.'

29.10 Felipa de Montoya, the Wife of Jeroni Desclergue, and Her Family.

29.10.1 Etymology of de Montoya

Several theories exist concerning the origin of the name 'de Montoya.' Only two theories are plausible when compared to the spread of the variants involved in each theory. Many names in Spain have Arabic, Sephardic, or South French origins. In the case of 'de Montoya,' two plausible origins exist, and, very likely, they are both right and converged into the modern Spanish 'de Montoya.' The Sephardic origin is 'De Monte Yah,' where 'Yah' is Hebrew for God, so the word means something in the sense of 'from God's mountain.' The South French origin is in Occitania and is 'Mont Touya,' where 'Touya' is the old European expression, Occitanian in this case, for 'Gorse.' Gorse, shown in Figure 29.185, is also known as Ulex, Furze, or Whin and is a genus of flowering plants in the family Fabaceae. The genus comprises about 20 species of thorny evergreen shrubs in the subfamily Faboideae of the pea family Fabaceae. The species are native to parts of western Europe and northwest Africa, with most species in Iberia. Therefore, 'de Montoya' means either 'From God's Mountain' or 'From the Gorse Mountain.'

Interestingly, Gorse, known as 'Touya' in ancient dialects such as Occitanian, is the subject of myths involving the Devil. This is so in areas once influenced by Catharist beliefs but even beyond.

In the region of Brittany, various myths and folklore narratives revolve around the gorse plant, reflecting its significant cultural and symbolic resonance within traditional Breton society. One prevalent myth posits the Gorse's perpetual flowering as evidence of its divine origin, attributing its existence to a divine compromise. According to this myth, while God crafted the world's most exquisite flowers, the Devil, driven by malice, fashioned a botanical masterpiece characterized by an abundance of elongated green thorns. In response to such malevolent creativity, the benevolent deity purportedly decreed that this plant would bloom ceaselessly as compensation for its sinister genesis.

Another myth from Cap Sizun in Brittany portrays the Devil's envy at the prospect of Breton souls ascending to Paradise unabated. In a ploy to thwart their passage, the Devil beseeches God for an opportunity to claim souls, contingent upon the absence of gorse flowers. Exploiting this opportunity, the Devil strategically delays the blossoming of Gorse by indulging Bretons in earthly pleasures, such as revelry in vineyards and taverns, thereby diverting them from their spiritual trajectory and ensuring their descent into Hell.

A further narrative within Breton folklore introduces the figure of the "Pilour lann," a spectral entity condemned to the eternal task of harvesting and processing gorse to stoke the fires of purgatory. Manifesting on stormy nights through percussive sounds against the gables of antiquated dwellings, the Pilour lann remains invisible to human eyes, contrasting with the conspicuous presence of the Gorse Thief, known as "Al laer lann." The latter, once a mortal akin to ordinary individuals, incurred divine retribution for Gorse theft, consigned to perpetual visibility against the nocturnal sky with a burden of Gorse upon his back.

Moreover, prevailing beliefs among Breton communities depict Gorse with ambivalence, attributing its creation to the Devil's attempt to mimic the divine craftsmanship exhibited in the broom plant. Consequently, Gorse is imbued with ominous connotations, symbolizing death and misfortune, discouraging its use in household adornments or floral arrangements. Nevertheless, Gorse is also ascribed with protective qualities, mainly when utilized in constructing churn pestles, purportedly thwarting the evil intentions of witches and safeguarding butter from bewitchment.

Additionally, Breton folklore associates Gorse with the penitential realm of purgatory, wherein souls undergo expiatory tribulations amidst its prickly thickets. To avoid offending these ethereal tenants and to maintain their safety, Breton tradition advises individuals to cough audibly when traversing gorse-laden landscapes and refrain from heedlessly despoiling its foliage for frivolous purposes.

Although Gorse has been traditionally associated with the Devil, it has not been universally regarded as evil. For example, according to ancient folklore detailed in "The Secret Power of Plants and Other Secrets of Witches" by Michel Viard (Editions Larousse – August 22, 2018), Gorse is believed to provide reliable protection against adversaries. It is said that this shrub is considered a sworn enemy of the Devil because its perennial flowering is attributed to a gift from Jesus. A similar legend of Scottish origin also exists, reinforcing this notion of divine favor bestowed upon the Gorse plant.

In the area of Loudun, near Angers in France, we find the Loudunese Legend. In forests such as Scévolles, Gorse tends to thrive following logging activities, capitalizing on the space before new trees take root. This phenomenon, common among forest shrubs, was historically exploited by the inhabitants, who utilized Gorse for various purposes. Traditional practices included bundling dry Gorse, valued for its highly flammable nature, to ignite bread ovens. Additionally, Gorse served as fodder and bedding during times of scarcity when straw was scarce.

The Legend of the Flowering Gorse Forest plants often carried mystical connotations appreciated by past rural communities, a theme co-opted by Christianity to convey theological messages through saintly narratives. The Legend of Sainte-Radegonde and the Gorse, echoing similar tales like that of Avoines, unfolds in the forest of Scévolle near Loudun, a region abundant with Gorse. Legend has it that during a winter journey from her villa in Saix near Poitiers, Sainte-Radegonde, accompanied by her companions, sought refuge behind a Gorse bush upon learning of her husband King Clotaire's pursuit. However, the Devil, spying on them, instructed his magpie to expose their hiding place. Just as they were about to be apprehended, the gorse bush miraculously blossomed, deterring Clotaire from further pursuit. As a result, Sainte-Radegonde cursed the magpie, condemning its descendants to wear half-mourning plumage and emit hoarse cries instead of songs.

In Occitania and Gascogne (France), the name Touya remains 'Touya' and 'Touyarot.' 'Touyà' is the Gascon name for a place planted with Gorse.

(Note that typos may result from registers having been copied from older original records, which is the case for Harelbeke). The godfather was Joanne Cotignie from Deerlijk.*

Even today, we find the name 'Duvelsnéigoame' in the dialect of the Dutch Veluwe area. Gorse is also known as Ulex, Furze, or Whin. Priests and administrators unfamiliar with Spanish names and culture, must have felt hesitant to write 'Demon Toya' and would prefer a local similar surname, Du Thoo in documents. In Iberia, the Occitan form of 'Touya' for Gorse has transformed into 'Tojo' and 'Toxo.' At the same time, the names 'De Monte Yah' and 'De Mont Touya' became 'de Montoya,' which was, to Iberians, most likely associated with a mountainous origin.

Upon migration to other regions in Europe, Flanders, in particular, a 'De Montoya' would find his name easily associated with 'Demon Touya,' meaning 'Devil's Gorse.' It's hard to imagine priests without Spanish roots not feeling some reluctance when writing 'Demon' in their documents. For this reason, a person carrying the name 'De Montoya' would rather have his name noted in ecclesiastic documents as the local name 'Du Thoo' unless the priest was familiar with Spanish names.

Indeed, as in Brittany, in Flanders, and, in fact, everywhere in the low countries, the plant 'Gorse' was associated with the Devil. A Devil's Touya was, for them, a natural connection between two words. In contemporary Dutch, 'Gaspeldoorn' and 'Brem' refer to Gorse or Touya. Nevertheless, within the historical context of the Low Countries, alternate designations of 'Touya' included references to the Devil within the plant's nomenclature. For instance, in a dialect retained in the Veluwe region of the Netherlands, the term for 'Gaspeldoorn' is rendered as 'Duvelsnéigoame' (where 'Duvel' signifies Devil or Demon).

Presumably influenced by such considerations, Felipa de Montoya and her sister chose to identify themselves by the name 'De Toy' or 'Du Thoo' rather than 'De Montoya.' unless the priest or other official was Spanish or was very familiar with Spanish names and traditions.

It is, therefore, not surprising that we find her in records under Felipa, Philippa, Philippe, Phlypothe, or even 'Pe,' while her family name in her case and that of her relatives appears as Montoya, Montoye, Montoie, Montoi, but also Du Toi, Du Thoy, Thoy, Toi, de Thoo, ...

During the early 17th century, women were commonly delineated by their marital status, subsuming their individual identities within the context of their husband's social standing. For instance, Felipa de Montoya habitually denoted herself as Doña Desclergue, underscoring her relational association rather than asserting her personal appellation. Notably, the deployment of her actual name ensued solely when exigencies demanded it, with the chosen format contingent upon prevailing circumstances.

29.10.2 Her Ancestors

Felipa de Montoya descends from Pedro de Montoya and Juana de Mendoça, shown in Figure 29.175.

Felipa de Montoya was the daughter of Pedro de Montoya and Maria Anna Diaz (possibly with Portuguese roots). Her grandfather was Juan de Montoya, and her grandmother was Susanna or Osana. Juan de Montoya married twice. His second wife was Catarina Jacoba de Liedekerke. The family originated from the North-West of Spain (Navarra, Galicia, Leon) and was linked to the noble House of Braña. Through the marriage with de Liedekerke, Felipa de Montoya also became related to Carlos Coloma de Saa, as described in Chapter 29.10.11, Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) friend.

29.10.3 Her Marriage with Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05)

Felipa de Montoya married Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05) until he died in 1604. Their children are described in Chapter 29.9.

She married Jan Declercq (DK03) later, as described in Chapter 29.10.5.

29.10.4 Her Acquaintance with the Declercq family in Kortrijk

Jeroni Desclergue (DC05) came from a notable family in Montblanc, most of whom were notaries. Felipa was also from a notable family. When they arrived in Kortrijk, they naturally became friends with people of similar standing. This is how they became acquainted with the Declercqs of Kortrijk, notables, tradespeople, notaries, clerks, and aldermen. This family is described in Chapter 34.13.7. The families were also business partners.

For instance, we found Felipa de Montoya as godmother in Figure 29.174, at Kortrijk in 1594.

In Figure 29.184 on page 441 at Kortrijk, March 1601, we find Felipa de Montoya ('Philippa Clercq') in a warrantee of Jan Declercq (DK03). Her presence in Kortrijk was most likely optional, as the document was made by Jan Declercq (DK03). Indeed, she resided in Barcelona then with her husband Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05), only to return in 1602.

29.10.5 Her Marriage with Jan Declercq (DK03)

Isabeau Braye was the first wife of Jan Declercq (DK03). Felipa de Montoya, widowed in 1604, and Jan Declercq (DK03) married in 1611 after the death of Isabeau Braye, as can be inferred from Figure 34.252 on page 609 and Figure 34.253 on page 610.

29.10.6 The Siblings of Felipa de Montoya and the Ximenes de la Cruz Family

Felipa's siblings were Jerome de Montoya, described in Chapter 29.10.7, Maria de Montoya, and Juana de Montoya.

Maria de Montoya was born on August 15, 1559, at San Gil y Santa Anna in Granada and would later marry first Hieronimo Lopez on February 22, 1590, in Valladolid and, after the husband's death, Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz. The Spanish records show that Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz married Maria de Montoya in Granada on May 8, 1596. The document is shown in Chapter 37.4.2. Pedro would marry Maria de Sopena after the death of Maria de Montoya and have a daughter, Martina de la Cruz, with her, who would later marry a grandson of Felipa de Montoya.

The first marriage of Maria de Montoya resulted in a son, Juan Lopez de Montoya, who married Catharina Ruiz. Interestingly, more than five months after the death of Felipa de Montoya in 1628, the couple Juan Lopez de Montoya and Cathelina Ruiz baptized their daughter in Labastida, Alava, Pais de Vasco in Spain, on May 14, 1628, and named her Felipa ('Philipa') Lopez de Montoya.

Juana de Montoya was baptized at Torre, in Burgos, Spain in 1561, on the 11th of March at the church La Asuncion.

Jerome de Montoya died during the Siege of Ostend in or before 1604. We also direct the reader to Chapter 34.12.2 to find additional evidence of Felipa de Montoya's ascendence.

29.10.7 Jeronimo de Montoya, senior

Jeronimo de Montoya was a brother of Felipa de Montoya. He died in Ostend and, therefore, shared the destiny of Felipa's husband, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). We can refer to Abbé Dehaisnes[82], who stastes:

'1615, — « Registre des Chartres de l' an 1615. » — Lettres des archiducs Albert et Isabelle , princes souverains et gouverneurs généraux des Pays-Bas, Légitimation par les mêmes princes : de Jérôme de Montoya, fils de Jeronimo, soldat en la compaignie d' infanterie Espaignolle de don Diego Velasquez de la Canal, du tercio du maistre de camp Diego de Durango, mort aux tranchées devant Oostende.'

We have found three children of Jeronimo de Montoya senior, i.e., Jeronimo junior, described in Chapter 29.10.8, Antonio, described in Chapter 29.10.9, and Maria.

29.10.8 Jeronimo de Montoya, junior

Jeronimo de Montoya junior is found in 1615, in Figure 29.177, at Antwerp, as godfather to the son of Gaspar de Villalba, together with the godmother Domicella Anna de Montero. Jeronimo de Montoya junior was a nephew of Felipa de Montoya and son of Jeronimo de Montoya, who died in Ostend in or before 1604, the year that his brother-in-law Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) died there too. Jeronimo de Montoya Junior had a son, Juan de Montoya, described in Chapter 29.10.8.1.

29.10.8.1 Juan de Montoya

Juan de Montoya was a son of Jeronimo de Montoya junior and was named after Felipa de Montoya's grandfather. We assume that he must have been born around 1615. He died in 1678 at the age of around 65. He was a senior military member in a Royal Army regiment at the time of his death. He was likely killed and thrown in the Leie River, or he died by drowning at Sint Eloois Vijve during struggles between French and Spanish armies. His first appearance was at the baptism of Joannes De Vos in Harelbeke in 1633, in Figure 29.178. We refer to Chapter 48.4 to read more about Joannes De Vos.
Juan de Montoya is described in more detail on his death certificate in Figure 29.179. The document says:
'Submersus est in Lisa 16 maii Juan de Montoya nobilis dominus de Braña miles regius s(ecund)ae cohortis.'
In other words, Juan de Montoya drowned in the Leie River on May 16, 1678 at Sint Eloois Vijve; he was a nobleman from the house of Braña. The term 'miles regius secundae cohortis' refers to the second cohort, or in other words, the allied (Spanish) army, because the primary cohort at that time in Sint Eloois Vijve was French since the latter had constructed headquarters in the village (at the tip of the Casselrye of Kortrijk) to attack the neighboring areas to the east, including Ghent. The town was at the junction of the Leie and Mandel Rivers, so perhaps Juan de Montoya drowned when he wanted to cross the river to return to a Spanish-held area.
The house of Braña is the one with which the Montoyas were linked and was found in several places in Spain, including the North-West.
In the same period, Pere Declerque (DC07d), a soldier, son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), had his daughter Juana Felipa baptized upon his passage through Sint Eloois Vijve. The episode is described in Chapter 36.7, where the baptism certificate is shown.
In Chapter 36.7, there is also a baptism delivered of Juan Sanz, son of a Spanish soldier David Sanz, at Waregem (next to Sint Eloois Vijve), on September 5, 1678. The record shows that Spanish troops traversed or occupied the area during the conflict with the French.

29.10.9 Antonio de Montoya

Just as Jeronimo De Montoya in Chapter 29.10.8, Antonio de Montoya was also a son of Jeronimo de Montoya senior. He was baptized at Harelbeke in May of 1598, in Figure 29.180.
We found Antonio de Montoya as a godfather in Antwerp, seen in Figure 29.176, in 1623, shown in Chapter 29.10.10.

29.10.10 Maria de Montoya, junior

As described in the previous section, Maria de Montoya was Antonio de Montoya's sister. She was married to Juan Davila. When the couple had a son at Antwerp in 1623, in Figure 29.181, Antonio was the godfather and gave his name to the child.
In Spain, Montoya's name is sometimes written as Montolla, Montollo, or Montoyo; in the Perpignan areas, it is sometimes called Montalla or Motalla.
Maria de Montoya acted as godmother to Maria Rapsaet in Harelbeke, shown in Figure 29.183, in 1624 in Figure 29.182. The priest clearly did not understand the name of the village Maria de Montoya came from; therefore, he wrote 'ex pago de...' without further specification.

29.10.11 Felipa de Montoya was related to Carlos Coloma de Saa

It is outlined in Chapter 29.5.2 that Carlos Coloma de Saa played a significant role in the life of Jeroni Desclergue (DC05). He also recruited Antoni Desclergue (DC06), described in Chapter 34.5.
Besides friendship and a military bond, Jeroni Desclergue (DC05) also found a liaison with Carlos Coloma de Saa through his wife, Felipa De Montoya. Indeed, she was related to the Coloma family, as shown in Figure 29.190 on page 443.

29.10.12 Other Montoyas in Belgium

29.10.12.1 Francisco De Salazar y Montoya

Francisco De Salazar y Montoya was a military captain residing at the Spaniard castle of Ghent. His burial is shown in Figure 29.186 on page 441. He must have had a father with the name Salazar and a mother with the name Montoya.

29.10.12.2 Christophoro de Montoya

29.10.12.3 Pierre Louis de Montoya

Pierre Louis de Montoya married Maria de Cortes in Brussels, Koudeberg, in 1648, in Figure 29.188 on page 442. The witnesses, de Bucquoy and Prienne, are families that also appear elsewhere in our ancestry and their relationships, such as in Figure 34.102 on page 557.

29.10.12.4 Catharina de Montoya

Catharina de Montoya married Antoni De Pollo in Ostend in 1627, in Figure 29.189 on page 442. In the same year, Anna Desclergue (DC06f), described in Chapter 29.9.3, who was married to Vincentius Staelens, died in Ostend.

29.10.12.5 Antonius de Montoya

Antonius de Montoya appeared as a witness in Ghent, on a wedding of Maria Clara van Delen and Roger Douche, the attorney of the Council of Flanders, in 1682, in Figure 29.191 on page 443.

29.11 The Orphans of Jeroni Desclergue, Ius Inter Gentes, their Inheritance, and the Destiny of Felipa de Montoya

The descendants of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) are shown in Figure 29.192. While ’Ius Inter Gentes’ is illustrated in Figure 29.193.

29.11.1 Ius Inter Gentes and Citizen Rights

To fully grasp the treatment of Felipa de Montoya and her children in the aftermath of her husband Jeroni’s (DC05) death in 1604, it is crucial to delve into the international and interregional legal frameworks that shaped their fate.

The Spanish Salamanca School, a towering figure in legal thought during that era, not only laid the groundwork for modern international law, termed ius inter gentes, but also left an indelible mark on it, a testament to the enduring influence of Roman law.[83][84][85]

Jurisdictional complexities arose due to the varied regional laws governing the lives of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), a Catalan, and his wife, Felipa de Montoya. Following Jeroni’s death, Felipa’s subsequent marriage to Jan Declercq (DK03) in 1611 brought additional legal considerations, particularly concerning inheritance for her children.

While Catalan law initially governed Jeroni and Felipa, inheritance issues for assets acquired during her marriage to Jan Declercq fell under local jurisdiction, specifically the Costumen van Cortryck. Her marriage to Jan was subject to the local laws of Tournai, based on Frankish law.

Crucially, Felipa and her children were entitled to be treated most advantageously according to both legal systems. Their status would adapt to preserve their most favorable legal position wherever they resided.

Jan Declercq’s (DK03) social standing and expertise in legal matters facilitated the integration of Jeroni’s orphans into the Kortrijk bourgeoisie without nuisance. His family’s status as notaries, aldermen, clerks, and landowners was instrumental in this process.

Carolina Obradors Suazo[86] provides insight into the acquisition of citizenship in cities such as Barcelona, emphasizing stable residence, marriage, profession, and fiscal contribution as critical criteria. Felipa and her children did not meet these requirements in Barcelona, even not their son Antoni Desclergue (DC06), who had been born in Barcelona. However, after her marriage to Jan Declercq, Felipa fulfilled the requirements applicable to Kortrijk and was thus considered a Bourgeois of Kortrijk under Catalan law, with local laws automatically applying these rights. Local customs stipulated that a foreign woman marrying a local citizen would acquire the same rights as her husband without needing a personal appearance, extending these rights to her children from her previous marriage:

’Elck vremde ende gedijde vrouw-persoon haer beghevende ten huwelik met poorter deser stede, sal de selve met de consummatie van dien, poorteresse bedijden neffens haren man, sonder dat noodich wordt daer toe personelick te compareren, ende de voornomde poorterye inder manieren als vooren an te nemen.’

In the context of Felipa de Montoya’s marriage to Jan Declercq in Tournai, it is essential to delve into the laws of how their union affected the status and rights of their respective children from previous marriages. Under Frankish law, as applied in Tournai, the marriage contract aimed to unify the children from both partners’ prior marriages, ensuring equal status for all offspring.

This legal framework sought to integrate and provide equal standing to all children within the new family structure, thereby acknowledging Jan Declercq as their legal father in most respects.

Conversely, the legal system in Kortrijk did not possess specific provisions for the unification of children from previous marriages. Thus, the legal mechanisms in Kortrijk had to adapt to accommodate this unique familial situation. The principle guiding the local law in Kortrijk allowed children born out of wedlock or from a previous marriage to inherit their mother’s status. Consequently, Felipa’s children from her marriage to Jeroni were entitled to the same rights recognized under her new marriage.

The children were afforded equal treatment with Jan Declercq’s biological children, a practice reflecting the intention of the Tournai marriage contract. This integration extended to legal recognition for all purposes except inheritance rights. The rationale was that while the local law in Kortrijk could provide Felipa’s children with equivalent civic rights and status, it could not alter the fundamental inheritance entitlements tied to their biological parentage. Each child retained the right to inherit from their respective biological parent, preserving the integrity of their original familial lines.

Thus, in Kortrijk, Felipa’s children were legally acknowledged as Jan Declercq’s civic status and rights per the principles established by their mother’s marriage contract in Tournai. This recognition was essential for ensuring the children enjoyed the same civic privileges and social standing as their step-siblings.

However, the local legal framework required a distinction to be maintained when it came to inheritance. Each child was entitled to inherit assets and properties acquired by their biological parents before the new marriage. This bifurcation ensured that the inheritance rights of each child remained intact, in line with the legal traditions of their biological parentage.

Applying local laws in Kortrijk provided a nuanced approach to integrating the children from Felipa and Jan’s previous marriages. By granting them equal status and rights under the civic framework, the laws respected the unified family structure envisioned by the Tournai marriage contract. However, the local inheritance laws preserved the individual inheritance rights of each child, maintaining a balance between the unified family structure and the traditional legal entitlements tied to their biological lineage.

This application of international or interregional law demonstrates the interplay between Catalan customs, rooted in Roman

The latter is typically pronounced as if the ' c' were a ' z' . It refers to a share which belonged to the children as per Catalan, hence Spanish, inheritance law.*

Figure 29.207: *Note that in 1772, i.e., 150 years after Felipa de Montoya died, the laws of Kortrijk were such that Bourgeois Foraines always split the entire property in two when one of the partners died. Only exceptionally, as read in the last sentence of the above article, this was not done, such as when there was a contract or when, after a discussion between legal experts, it was otherwise decided. As shown earlier, we have not retrieved the specific 'costumen' of Kortrijk of 1628 and rely on the Flemish ones for Ypres. However, we may induce that dividing common property in two was usance, or else a specific reason was necessary. After Felipa de Montoya's death, one property was reserved for the two boys, which indicates an exceptional situation. law,[87][88][89][90][91][92][93][94][95] and local Flemish laws of Kortrijk and Frankish law in Tournai, highlighted in Chapter 29.11.2.

Under Catalan custom, citizenship and rights often followed the father's condition. However, in this case, local Flemish law allowed the children to inherit their mother's status and thus be recognized as citizens through their stepfather Jan Declercq. This is reflected in the Bourgeoisie registry, where the children are identified as Jan's offspring, granting them citizenship rights as Bourgeois Forains.

'Et an aliquis natus ex comitissima et cive Barchinonae eius viro efficitur cives Barchinonae? Et dic quod licet quam tum ad servitutem, et libertatem filius sequatur conditione matris, videtur tamen quo ad honores et munera et civitatem sequitur patris conditionem'[96][97]. We equally refer to the work of Encarna Roca i Trias[98], Pilar Domínguez Lozano[99], Montserrat Bajet i Royo[100] It states:

'And whether someone born of a countess and a citizen of Barcelona becomes a citizen of Barcelona?'

'And it is said that although a son follows the condition of his mother in terms of servitude and freedom, it seems that regarding honors, duties, and citizenship, he follows the condition of his father.'

The statement begins with a question about the civic status of a child born to a mother of noble rank (a countess) and a father who is a citizen of Barcelona. Specifically, it asks whether such a child becomes a citizen of Barcelona. The first part of the answer acknowledges that the child inherits the mother's condition regarding servitude and freedom. This means that if the mother is free, the child is free; if the mother is in servitude, the child is also in servitude. This part emphasizes that the fundamental status of freedom or bondage is derived from the mother's status.

However, the statement clarifies that the child follows the father's status in terms of honors, duties, and citizenship. This implies that the social rank, civic responsibilities, and the right to be a citizen of Barcelona are inherited from the father. If the father is a citizen, the child inherits the father's citizenship and associated civic duties and honors.

Had the laws in Barcelona been applied to Kortrijk, the children of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés would not have become 'bourgeois.' So, the principles of ius inter gentes played to their advantage.

This legal framework explains why the children are recorded in the Bourgeoisie registry as the offspring of Jan Declercq, from whom they derived their rights to citizenship (Bourgeois Forains, or Burghers). In other documents, which reference their biological father, they are identified as either 'Jeroni' or 'Joan,' consistent with the name of their natural father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés.

Flemish laws further reinforced the maternal connection, asserting that a mother's status could legitimize children and confer citizenship rights. Specific statutes declared that all children of citizens, whether legitimate or illegitimate, were considered citizens. This biological reality was enshrined in local laws, ensuring that Felipa's children were fully integrated into the citizenry of Kortrijk.

'een moeder maakt geen bastaard,' and,

'Niemant en sal bastaert weesen van moeder en moederlicke zyde.'

In particular, we can refer to the rule held in towns in Flanders, that

'Alle kinderen van poorters ofte poorteresse der voornomde stede soo wel ghetraude als bastaerde zijn gehouden voor poorters;' and also,

'Sullen oock met eenen, dit poort-recht vercrijghen, alle hunne minder-jarige kinderen, buyten dese stede gewonnen sijnde, indien sy eenige hebben.'

29.11.2 Unio Prolium, civil and Inheritance Rights

Unio Prolium is what Frankish law in Tournai could provide. The creation of fictitious lineages fills a specific need of human society. In areas where adoption was unknown, a similar legal form was developed: the 'One-childship.' This distinct legal creation can be found mainly in Germany but also in the customs of Roermond, Maastricht, Sint-Amands, Bléharis, and Tournai.

Unio Prolium, or Eenkindschap in Dutch, was an agreement between a remarrying man and woman whereby children from a previous marriage become equal to those from the new union under a preset condition or distinction to be determined when the agreement is made. It was similar to a prenup but concerned the children and their decided privileges or equality. Thus, the children from different marriages became, in many ways, full brothers and sisters of each other.[101][102][103][104]

In other words, the Eenkindtschap aimed to achieve full equality, possibly with a predetermined and chosen offset, of children from a widow's or widower's first marriage with those from their second marriage. The agreement was called 'simple' if only one of the spouses had children from a previous marriage and 'plural' if both had children from an earlier marriage.

Such a contract of Eenkindschap, Eenzusterschap, or Eenbroederschap had to be executed before a judicial authority and could not be done in all cities. In addition, guardians had to be appointed for the children. The judge ruled in fairness after hearing the guardians. Eenkindtschap was accepted as an exception to the principle of Der Erbe wird gebrn, nicht erkoren. Frankish-based law applied in Tournai made it possible to treat all children in the newly composed family completely equally when a widow remarried. Such did not exist in Kortrijk. In other words, if such a family moved to Kortrijk (or Deerlijk), and the equal rights of the children had to be safeguarded, the stepfather became the legal father according to local law. There was no other option; otherwise, it would have been a breach of contract concluded in Tournai. In addition to creating family unity, the Eenkindtschap undoubtedly had a feudal secondary objective: keeping the property within the family. It should be noted that this extraordinary institution has many similarities with adoption, as we find it in later Belgian legislation. An Eenkindschap agreement was, therefore, a prenuptial agreement considering the involved children. It often included specific property reserved for children in the newly-assembled married. Other than this, all children were considered equal and treated as if they stem from both marrying parents.

29.11.3 Ius Inter Gentes, Civil and Inheritance Rights

29.11.3.1 Introduction

As mentioned in Chapter 29.11.1, Spanish nationals fell under Spanish jurisdiction. In Jeroni's case, Catalan laws applied. Catalan inheritance laws were used when Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) died. When his wife Felipa de Montoya died, the ius inter gentes applied, which means that her original possessions, shared with her Catalan husband Jeroni (DC05), were inherited differently than the possessions she gathered together with her later husband Jan Declercq (DK03). The marriage of Jan Declercq (DK03) and Felipa de Montoya fell under Frankish law in Tournai.

Consequently, goods obtained after her marriage with Jan Declercq (DK03) would fall under local jurisdiction: Costumen van Cortryck. Additionally, she was privileged with the right to be treated in the most advantageous way of both legal systems, and so were her children with Jeroni. The latter privilege was even further enforced by the fact that the son Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was born in Barcelona, and the ius inter gentes principle of the Salamanca school equally applied to him as an individual.

In the Orphan's deed in Figure 29.197, after the death of Felipa de Montoya, the Spanish or Catalan word herencia or herençia, as illustrated in Figures 29.198 and 29.199, is used to describe the possessions stemming from Jeroni (DC05), when his children inherited from their mother Felipa. At the same time, the distribution of the inheritance further clarifies the situation, as do other documents. In Chapter 29.9.6, Chapter 34.2, and Chapter 49, there are numerous church certificates shown that distinguish Jeroni's children from those of Jan Declercq (DK03), sometimes by adding a statement, sometimes by using a different spelling and in the choice of sacrament witnesses.

The inheritance laws of Kortrijk were modern and closer related to the later ones imposed by Napoleon in his Code Civil and those who currently apply in Belgium. However, the Spanish laws differed in the 17th century and deserved a study, as shown below.

We investigated several works, including Angels Torrents[105], from whom we cite:

'The predominant household pattern in Catalonia was the patrilocal stem family,.. a pattern in which the eldest son ('hereu' in Catalan) or, in the absence of a son, the eldest daughter ('pubilla' in Catalan), inherited all their father's holdings. The key to the succession was a donation called 'heretament' in Catalan, made in the marriage contract, whereby the parents promised their estate to their chosen heir(s). The father or the widowed mother fully possessed their own property, which they could administer as they pleased until their death. When death occurred, the parents would usually designate a universal heir. However, almost always in money, a quarter of the total inheritance was shared among all legitimate children (including the primary heir or heiress). The married siblings who were not heirs and had received the dowry (women) or the legitime (men) at their wedding could not contest their parents' will. When there was no will, the inheritance would be divided into equal shares.'

Torrents also mentions in his footnote 17, although it refers to a later period than the subject of his leading article,

'We have looked at 151 wills, from 1850 to 1899, where more than 95% designated universal heir and only in 5% was the inheritance divided into equal shares.'

29.11.3.2 Felipa de Montoya's Extended Family

Jan Declercq (DK03), the widower of Isabeau Braye, served as stepfather to the children of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) after his marriage, in 1611, with Felipa de Montoya. He integrated them into the Kortrijk society, allowing them to be Outside Burghers (Bourgeois Foraines, buitenpoorters or citizens) of Kortrijk.

His descendants are described in Chapter 34.13.7, and, in particular, in Chapter 34.13.8. They were Ambrosius Declercq (DK04k) (a presbyter), Jeronimus Joannes Declercq (DK04h), Cathelyne Declercq (DK04j), Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), and Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e).

Felipa had the following children, described in Chapter 29.9: Juana Desclergue (DC06c) (she died in 1622), Maria Desclergue (DC06e) (she died in childhood), Anna Desclergue (DC06f) (she died in 1627 and had no surviving children), Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) (he had already received his legitima when he became a priest before 1611), and Miguel Desclergue (DC06b).

It means that, in 1628, only three of Felipa's biological children received an inheritance from her, one being excluded from the reserved share because he was a priest and had received his legitima before 1611. So, Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d) would only inherit his (1/16th) share from the accumulated wealth of his mother and his stepfather. Additionally, five children of Jan Declercq were also beneficiaries (DK03). Therefore, only Felipa's two unmarried biological children inherited the share reserved for them when she married Jan Declercq (DK03) in 1611.

Felipa de Montoya, a woman with noble roots and Spanish pride, chose to remain an unmarried widow for almost seven years before remarrying. Her decision, in contrast to the typical practice of Flemish women who remarried promptly following their husband's death, was a testament to her resilience and determination to protect her rights and familial ties. Unlike Flemish women, who typically remarried promptly following their husband's death, Spanish widows were generally hesitant to remarry swiftly. This reluctance stemmed from the potential forfeiture of their rights concerning their deceased husband's estate and familial ties.

Consequently, it is improbable that Felipa de Montoya would have married someone before 1606. In Spain, it was customary, and often legally mandated, for a widow to observe a mourning period of at least one year before entering into another marriage. Any violation of this customary period would have had significant implications for her financial and legal standing concerning the Desclergues family in Montblanc.[106]. She waited, indeed, until 1611.

When Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05) died in 1604, the authorities arranged his inheritance according to Catalan law. When his widow died in 1628, her legacy was set according to the local Flemish law. We refer for instance to pages 804-811 of 'Vlaems recht dat is Costvmen ende wetten ghedecreteert by de graven ende gravinnen van Vlaenderen. Waer by ghevoeght syn d' interpretatien, concessien caroline, ordonnantien politiqve, hanseryen, &c, Volume 2,' Ghedruckt by Maximiliaen Graet, 1664,' in particular, 'Costumen vande Casselrye van Ipre' (as a representative example). The relevant articles are shown in Figures 29.194, 29.195 and 29.196. Comparison with a later document exposing the laws of Kortrijk, in Figure 29.207, shows that Kortrijk must have applied the same.

29.11.3.3 The Inheritance

As elucidated in 29.11.3.2, upon the death of Felipa de Montoya in 1628, her sons Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) became beneficiaries of her estate through two primary avenues. Firstly, they received the portion reserved for them following Felipa's remarriage to Jan Declercq (DK03) in 1611. Secondly, they acquired their equitable share of the estate among the eight children of the extended family (including Jeroni's son Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d), who had become a priest before 1611), who were entitled to inherit the wealth accumulated by Felipa and her husband Jan post their 1611 nuptials in Tournai. Moreover, the surviving spouse, Jan Declercq (DK03), was entitled to inherit half of the accumulated wealth.

It means Antoni (DC06) and Miguel (DC06b) received each 1/16 of the accumulated wealth, in addition to their reserved inheritance, which they had to split in two, one share for Antoni and one share for Miguel.

This is why Antoni and Miguel inherited each half of the farmland, and some money, when Felipa died, 500 lands in size, coming from the 'herencia' originating from their Catalan father, arranged according to Catalan law and made possible through the prenuptial agreement Felipa had made with Jan Declercq when she remarried in Tournai.

The Orphan's deed at Deerlijk in 1628 after Felipa De Montoya's death is depicted in Figure 29.197, transcribed and translated below. Note that her name appears in different formats, and we would like to refer the reader in this context also to Chapter 73.10.3.3 and Chapter 29.10.1.

- idem half of a piece of land from their Catalan inheritance (herençia), with the goods thereon, amounting to 500 lands and held by Overacker, in common with Antoni Desclergue (DC06), his brother, and, in addition also, the bare sum of one hundred and sixteen pounds and four Parisian shillings managed and properly maintained by the (step)father for his child under customary law.

Read, approved, and signed by François de Smet and Christaan Kethele, present. The guardians, on their part, also agree. The statement was made in the presence of Delarue and Valcgrave.

Note that 100 lands (in the area of Kortrijk) corresponds to 885 square meters. Jan Declercq (DK03dya) and Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) were sons of Jan Declercq (DK03dy), son of Jan Declercq's (DK03) brother Tomas Declercq (DK03d). Jan Declercq (DK03dy) is described in Chapter 34.13.6.1, Jan Declercq (DK03dya) is described 34.13.8.1, and Chapter 34.13.8.2. Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) is described in Chapter 34.13.8.3.

In Chapter 29.10.6 we mention that Felipa's sister's son Juan Lopez de Montoya was married to Cathelina Ruiz, and they baptized their daughter Felipa Lopez de Montoya on May 14, 1628, i.e. a few months after Felipa de Montoya's death, at Alava, Pais Vasco, Spain.

Before an orphan's deed, a property statement is typically made in preparation,[107] shown in Figures 29.200, 29.201, 29.202, 29.203, 29.204, 29.205, 29.206. The paper's contents are identical to the Orphan's deed. It explicitly states that no guardian was found on the mother's side because the declarants didn't know anyone. It means that Felipa de Montoya probably had no contact with her own family, an obvious consequence of her being a Spanish widow in Flanders.

This tranquil area was nicknamed 'Ten Rust' and leading towards a Saint Anne chapel, located in Beveren Leie on the corner of Kleine Heerweg en Grote Heerweg.*

In agreement with the property statement, there were eight surviving children involved that determined the share Miguel (DC06b), for whom the document was prepared, would inherit:
Ambrosius Declercq (DK04k), Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d), Jeronimus Joannes Declercq (DK04h), Cathelyne Declercq (DK04j), Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e) , Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and Miguel Desclergue (DC06b).
There were six married children involved (dead or alive):
Anna Desclergue (DC06f) (she died in 1627 with no surviving children), Jeronimus Joannes Declercq (DK04h), Cathelyne Declercq (DK04j), Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e), and Antoni Desclergue (DC06).
And, two children had died childless and unmarried: Juana Desclergue (DC06c) (she died in 1622), Maria Desclergue (DC06e) (she died at a young age).

29.12 The Spanish Military Barracks of Harelbeke, adjacent to Deerlijk

29.12.1 The Historical Perspective

Harelbeke held significant strategic importance for the Spanish military due to its location along the Leie River and possession of the only bridge between Kortrijk and Deinze. This bridge facilitated crucial crossings, and the surrounding flat, sandy land allowed for the construction of army barracks and the preparation of troops, with access to a quieter part of the Leie River (see Figure 29.208). A more detailed examination of this strategic significance is provided in Chapter 49. The flat area, bordered by the Leie River, Gaverbeek Creek, and Beveren Creek, offered natural protection and fresh drinking water. Hills to the south provided a protective barrier and visibility of Kortrijk.
However, this strategic advantage also made Harelbeke vulnerable to Calvinist filibusters from Ostend, who could attack via the river ('watergeuzen') and along the bridge ('bosgeuzen'). On October 24, 1590, filibusters from Ostend raided the area, attacking the religious nuns of Harelbeke's hospital and seizing all archives, valuables, and movable assets. André Woestijn notes that between 1592 and 1597, twelve homes were burned, and twenty people were taken prisoner due to Harelbeke's refusal to pay the filibusters. The gangs from Ostend, akin to a mafia, frequently took farmers hostage and plundered homes and churches.[110]
Given the intermittent presence of Spanish forces in the 16th century, Harelbeke organized its protection force, forming a city army. By 1592, this army comprised sixty soldiers and twenty cavalry, primarily housed at the castle of Sint Eloois Vijve, east of Harelbeke. The protection force, funded by the Castellany of Kortrijk, became a significant local power by 1597, akin to a modern police force rather than a military entity. The Spanish military, engaged in various campaigns, could not consistently protect the region.
Chapter 29.5 discusses the importance of the Manor of Overacker in Harelbeke, located near Deerlijk and Beveren (now Beveren-Leie, part of Waregem). The Beveren Creek, forming the Manor's border, marked where Spanish barracks were allowed. The Manor owned or rented lands in Deerlijk, Vichte, Harelbeke-Buiten (areas outside Harelbeke), and some properties within city borders. These lands were used to assemble large troops for significant military operations, such as sieges or the anticipated arrival of the Spanish Armada. The uninhabited flatlands south of Harelbeke and along Beveren Creek were often used for this purpose. The area, surrounded by Gaverbeek, Beverenbeek, and the Leie River, functioned as a military zone with varying levels of troop presence over time.
During peaceful periods, these lands, referred to as 'Gemeene Weeden,' were used for cattle grazing and taxed by the city of Harelbeke.[111] No taxes were charged in times of trouble, such as from 1580 to 1591. Between 1609 and 1625, the area known as 'Doolaeghe' was rented to the Spanish at a low price in exchange for protection. This period coincided with a truce between the Dutch Republic and the Spanish Netherlands, during which troops were concentrated to defend against French threats. Harelbeke's strategic location made it ideal for this purpose. The truce ended in 1621, leading to renewed military activity, including the sieges of Gulik, Bergen Op Zoom, Steenbergen, and Breda. After 1625, military demand decreased, and the 'Gemeene Weeden' was rented out in smaller sections.
Despite the significant presence of Spanish troops between 1609 and 1625, as evidenced in Chapter 34.5.14, no military maps from that period showing Spanish barracks locations have been found. However, it is known that when King Louis XIV of France arrived in the area in 1667, he stayed in the military camps of Harelbeke, indicating the pre-existence of these camps during the Spanish period (see Chapter 34.10). The consistency in the location of these camps over time is illustrated in maps by Beaurain from 1692 and 1755 (Figures 29.209 and 29.210), showing military camps south of the Leie River and along Beveren Creek.

Note the blue road in the east passes by Deerlijk where the Desclergues had a residence, to the Manor of Overacker in Harelbeke along the Beveren Creek with direct access to the Leie River. The blue road in the west via 'Belleghem' formed a straight connection with Tournai, where the Desclergues also resided for a while and where two children of Jeroni were baptized. Kortrijk is shown on this map as 'Courtray.'*

Figure 29.211: Drawings and paintings of Spanish military barracks. Sometimes they were tents, sometimes wooden constructions. The size was typically around 4m by 4m, and they were placed or constructed in rows of 4 or 5. Exceptionally, in particular inside cities, they were built of bricks. The roofs required drains every 4 m.

Figure 29.212: In the middle photo, there is a dish in the background, with in front of it, on the left, a drinking jug, and on the right, a cooking pot. The remains of two pipes are also visible. These finds come from excavations between the current 'College' and 'VTI' in Harelbeke in the 'Collegewijk' district. The finds were in a pit, and the researchers suspect they are objects from the 17th century, possibly from passing armies (sic). The left photo shows a drinking jug, photographed by the author in Montblanc. Possibly, the objects date from the same period, and the artifacts came from Harelbeke from Spaniards or others who manufactured almost the same pots and jugs in a similar traditional way. It can therefore be pottery from Spain or areas under Spanish rule, such as the west of present-day Germany. Nevertheless, research at the Musée d'Or in Metz, where pottery and kitchenware are exposed from around 1600, the closest similar one shown in the right photo (shown in the section 'vaisselle du XVIe sciecle' in the museum), has revealed similarities but not as close as between the ones in Spain and Harelbeke. The color of the drinking pot in Metz is more orange, while those in Harelbeke and Spain are more brown. The decoration also differs. The main difference is the roundness, which is lower in the drinking pots in Harelbeke and Spain and higher in those in Metz. The narrowing in the neck is also absent in the drinking vessels in Spain and Harelbeke. The findings indicate that the pottery found in Harelbeke must be from 1550-1650, but likely not from the area East or South-East of Belgium. It may, therefore, effectively be Spanish or made by the Spanish.[108]

The ditches were 4 m separated from each other. One of them is shown in the bottom-left photo. A schematic of the ditches is see as blue lines on the map, shown right, where the excavation trenches are indicated in red. The archaeological discoveries show rows where Spanish barracks used to stand, approximately 4m apart, with a drainage ditch in between. The excavations also revealed 14 artificial piles and 11 non-recent non-natural pits. There were also bomb craters found, but the report does not mention if they are due to recent wars or earlier. Note that the ditches easily fit a camp as shown in Figure 29.214*

The military zone likely extended from Pottelberg in Kortrijk to Deerlijk, along the Leie River, and included areas south of Harelbeke, bending towards Beveren Creek. The eastern boundary of this zone might have been marked by a historical checkpoint, now a pub called 'de barakke.' This boundary, near Deerlijk, aligns with the demarcation line along Heerbaan and Kortrijkse Heerweg. The flat, sandy territory was well connected to the Leie River and surrounding areas, facilitating military operations and minimizing resistance from inhabitants. The presence of Spanish troops on the Manor of Overacker lands likely provided steady financial income and political influence for the lords of the Manor.

From 1609 to 1625, Spanish troops were omnipresent in Harelbeke, fluctuating in number. After 1638, Harelbeke was no longer obliged to house soldiers, as noted by Woestijn.[112] The Council of Flanders released Harelbeke from this obligation on December 18, 1638. Early on, Spanish soldiers even resided in Harelbeke's church, as evidenced by Rogaer Deborchgrave's diary, which records beer deliveries to soldiers residing in the church from July 21, 1595, to July 2, 1596. The church, flourishing again in the early 1600s, was exempt from military contributions after the liberation of Ostend, eliminating the need for its military use.

Despite being an official city, Harelbeke needed more fortifications and was small in size, making it less appealing for housing Spanish troops within city limits. Woestijn's research indicates that significant military presence within the city was rare. However, soldiers frequently passed through due to Harelbeke's strategic location along a vital waterway and the main road from Kortrijk to Ghent. Military passings were particularly notable between 1603 and 1609, with records of numerous German, Irish, Scottish, English, and Italian soldiers passing through or temporarily residing in the city. For instance, on October 9 and 10, 1604, a Sergeant Major of the Tilly regiment[113] stayed in the town with sixteen soldiers and their families, requiring financial support from inhabitants. Similar events occurred in 1605 and 1607. The absence of a bridge from February 19, 1610, to November 5, 1612, when a new stone bridge was completed, also impacted troop movements.

Woestijn observed a significant increase in the Spanish military presence in Harelbeke from 1621 onward, following the end of the truce between the Spanish Netherlands and the Dutch Republic. The city hosted soldiers of various nationalities, and during periods of military concentration, barracks outside the town were insufficient, leading to the use of homes within the city. Although the town could refuse entry to soldiers, this often incurred costs and resulted in financial deficits.

The strategic location along Beveren Creek was advantageous for the Spanish and, later, the French, as demonstrated during World War I. On October 20, 1918, British allied forces successfully crossed the Leie River at a point just east of Beveren Creek, a location historically used by Spanish troops. The flat riverbanks facilitated this crossing, in contrast to steeper areas.

Guillermo Duclos Bautista's work provides a detailed account of Spanish military fortifications and barracks construction.[114] Standard living units measured approximately 4 by 4 meters, as depicted in Figure 29.211. Sometimes, these barracks were attached to units designed to hold horses.

29.12.2 Archaeological Evidence of the Spanish Barracks

From a local archaeological standpoint, the 16th and 17th centuries are unimportant, as local investigators primarily look for Roman and Germanic relics. Still, from time to time, artifacts are discovered from the Spanish period. One example is shown in Figure 29.212 on page 456.

We refer to a report of Ruben Willaert Restauratie & Archeologie, of 2017[115].

The report shows interesting maps that clarify that the area where the Spanish barracks supposedly were located, along the Beveren Creek, was situated in a flat area in the valley of the Creek, on moderately dry, loamy, sandy soil. The report also shows a map with several sites in and around Harelbeke, where archaeological research was done in the past. One particular spot on the plane where the barracks were located is of interest to us, CAI number 151737, located east of Harelbeke and rural. Nowadays, it is situated between the suburbs of 'Klein Harelbeke' and 'Arendswijk' along the road to Deerlijk (Deerlijksesteenweg), where 'Smeyershof' is located. We cite the report:

'Centrale Archeologische Inventaris (CAI) number 151737, Mechanische prospectie (2010); NK: 15 meter Onbepaald: Smalle ondiepe greppels met een lichtgrijze tot lichtbruine vulling die ofwel te maken hebben met de ontwatering van het terrein ofwel met landbouwactiviteit. Ze bevinden zich op een vrij regelmatige afstand van elkaar (meestal ongeveer 4 meter), Bron: Smeets M. 2010: Archeo-rapport 50. Het archeologische vooronderzoek aan de Deerlijksesteenweg te Harelbeke, Studiebureau Archeologie bvba.'

In other words, archaeologists found in that location, in 2010,

'Narrow, shallow ditches with a light grey to light brown fill that is related to the site's drainage or agricultural activity. They are at a reasonably regular distance from each other (usually about 4 meters).'

The archaeologists could not identify the period nor the identity of the ditches.

These were likely drain ditches of Spanish military barracks (perhaps sewage, perhaps rainwater drains, or else). Indeed, Spanish barracks typically consisted of rooms of approximately 4 m by 4 m and were attached to form large units. One drain per barrack means one ditch every 4 m.

According to the same report, the entire area between Harelbeke and Beveren Creek consists of 'Scc soil' . The legend describes this soil as 'The soil type Scc is a moderately dry, loamy, sandy soil with strongly spotted, crumbled texture B horizontal. Rust phenomena start between 60 and 90cm.'

When we check the description of the standard 'Scc soil' , we read the following:

'The soil is a bit too dry in the summer. They are good soils for summer cereals and potatoes, on which a lot of corn is currently grown, not suitable for pasture. The soils are also suitable for intensive horticulture and raw vegetable cultivation.'

In other words, this soil was relatively dry but could have been better for pasture. The ground was very flat, with a creek for drainage and easy access to the Leie River, while it was in an important geographical location.

These must have been the primary reasons this area was attractive for placing temporary barracks. Drainage canals showing the same periodicity as the size of barrack rooms seem very plausible.

Another report exists that shows photos of the discoveries and a comprehensive list of the discoveries.[116] The images are shown in Figure 29.213 on page 457. Most archeological relicts are narrow, shallow east-west trenches, 100 in total, with a light gray to light brown infill associated with the site's drainage. The trenches are spaced at a fairly regular distance from each other, each time at about 4 meters, and have been found in all trenches.

In addition, 14 artificial piles and 11 non-recent, non-natural pits were found.

Several bomb craters were also found with scrap metal, but the report contains insufficient information to determine whether these are craters from a recent war or earlier wars. The ditches fit a Spanish tent camp or a barrack camp, as the one shown in Figure 29.214 on page 457.

We can read some interesting information in Xander Alma's report too.[117]. The author made the following observations:

'Examples of early seventeenth-century urban barracks in the Netherlands are scarce. It is known that the first barracks that were built on the Spanish side in the Netherlands were in Den Bosch (1609), Dunkirk (1611), Maastricht, and Damme (1616) and that barracks were subsequently built in several Spanish cities and fortresses. These barracks were said to have been constructed of wood and stone and had rooms usually intended for four people (four bachelors or two couples) sleeping in two beds. There were also larger rooms that could accommodate eight people in four beds. The local government had to provide the furnishings of the barracks, such as furniture and beds. A Spanish barracks complex is known from Breda, built in 1630 on Akkerstraat. Another example of a Spanish complex is the barracks of La Petite-Magdalena in Lille. This complex was built in 1620 and consisted of several consecutive rooms with a length of 5.3 meters and a width of 4.5 meters (approximately 24 square meters). Each room had a fireplace, a door, a window on the ground floor courtyard, and two cross windows on the first floor on one side.'

Based on the similarities with the drains found at Harelbeke, these were probably barracks similar to those in Lille.

The reader who is interested in barracks during the Eighty Years War, may read the works of de Boer[118], where we cite:

'Bij Slijkenburg had men op een weide buiten het dorp een ondoelmatig, noodzakelijk duur verdedigingswerk aangelegd met barakken voor de verdedigers,' or in other words,

'At Slijkenburg, on a meadow outside the village, an ineffective, necessarily expensive defense work had been built with barracks for the defenders.,' or Vos.[119] Vos mentions, on page 97, that one particular complex (as an example) was built consisting of rooms of a specific size:

'Each room was 16 feet square (4.5 by 4.5 meters) and featured a corner fireplace, two box beds, a cupboard, a table, and two benches.'

We may also refer to other sources, such as Stadsarchief Breda.[120][121][122], and Alma[123]

A Dutch song is also found in Adriaen Valerius, Nederlandtsche Gedenck-clanck, 1626. The song, 'Merck toch hoe sterck (1622, A. Valerius),' goes as follows:

'Merck, toch hoe sterck, Nu int werck, sich al steld!
Die 't allen ty, Soo ons vryheyt heeft bestreden;
Siet hoe hy slaeft, graeft, en draeft met geweld!
Om onse goet, En ons bloet, En onse steden;

Chapter 30

Overview of Whereabouts of Jeroni Desclergue and his family in Flanders

30.1 Introduction

Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) likely spent his winters in Harelbeke or Deerlijk, near Kortrijk. Here, he or his wife, Felipa de Montoya, acquired a property belonging to Overacker shortly after his death, reserving it for their children's inheritance. Despite this, Jeroni (DC05) is documented in locations such as Kortrijk, Ghent, Tournai, Lille, Cambrai, and Barcelona. This mobility reflects the demands of his military career.

The presence of Jeroni Desclergue in Flanders in 1587 must be understood within the context of regional events that occurred a few years earlier in the area encompassing Kortrijk, Harelbeke, Deerlijk, Vichte, and Waregem. This region is situated near Cambrai, where Jeroni would participate in the siege of 1595, and Tournai, where he served in the early 17th century.

The mentioned area was part of the castellany of Kortrijk, which included locations closer to Damme and Sluis, such as Wingene and Pittem. This castellany bordered that of Tournai.

To comprehend the geography of Belgium around 1600, one must disregard modern highways and paved roads and instead focus on the rivers, particularly the Leie and Schelde. These rivers, which converge at Ghent, formed a crucial transportation network. They connected the city to Deerlijk, Harelbeke, Kortrijk, Menen, Oudenaarde, Tournai, Valenciennes, and Cambrai.

The old Roman road from Tournai to Kortrijk, a mere 26 km long, was a crucial route that could be comfortably traversed on foot in under six hours.[1] This transportation network, with its rivers and roads, was vital for the movement and strategic positioning of individuals like Jeroni Desclergue during that period, providing a clear picture of the logistical challenges he might have faced.

Figure 30.1 helps to visualize the geographical context. The Leie and Schelde Rivers, which joined at Ghent, connected various vital cities and facilitated movement.

30.2 The Spaniard Castle of Ghent

In 1587, Jeroni arrived in Ghent, taking up residence in the Spaniard Castle for two years before relocating to Kortrijk. The Spaniard Castle, a prominent feature on the map of Ghent in 1572 (see Figure 30.2), is identifiable as the square fortification at the top of the plan. Various images throughout this book document the lives of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and his descendants, providing valuable context and visual references.

Strategically positioned at the confluence of the Leie and Schelde Rivers, the Spaniard Castle played a crucial role in controlling the city of Ghent.

The surrounding wetlands, which could be deliberately flooded, added a defensive advantage to the castle's location. Although the castle no longer exists, its historical footprint can still be discerned in the modern street layout between Dampoort and Portus Ganda. The area once occupied by the castle is now bordered by Voorhoutkaai, Schoolkaai, Kasteellaan, and Slachthuisstraat, preserving a tangible connection to its past.

30.3 Kortrijk

In December 1589, Jeroni arrived in Kortrijk. His residence in Kortrijk was intermittently disrupted due to his military campaigns, yet it is evident that he maintained strong ties with the town until he died in 1604. It is plausible that his home resembled the one depicted in Figure 30.4.

Kortrijk boasts a rich history and was frequently subjected to military campaigns. Nowadays known as the Texas of Flanders due to its thriving economic activities, the town is a historical hub of fashion, textile, and flax industries.

The Battle of the Golden Spurs in 1302, commemorated in Figure 30.3, significantly ties Kortrijk to the origins of modern Belgium. This battle is a cornerstone of Flemish identity and pride.

The town holds personal significance for the author. He was born in Loofstraat, Kortrijk, and his children were born at Reepkaai and the New Academic Hospital, Kortrijk. Additionally, his two grandmothers and great-grandmother passed away in Kortrijk at the old hospital on Buda.

The emotional bond with Kortrijk traces back to Jeroni Desclergue's arrival at the end of the 16th century, intertwining personal and historical narratives within the boundaries of this venerable town.

30.4 Cambrai

In 1595, Jeroni participated in the capture of Cambrai, as described in Chapter 29.5.19. He was injured in the face and stayed some time at the hospital. We may, therefore, assume that, very likely, his wife and children also resided a little while at Cambrai. The town served as the governing headquarters for the Spanish in the southern part of Flanders. From a military standpoint, the city was of primordial importance for the defense against the French. Images and explanations concerning Cambrai appear in several chapters in this book.

30.5 Tournai

From 1597 and from 1601 until his passing, Tournai and Kortrijk were the primary residence of Jeroni and his family, with a brief interruption due to a temporary return to Spain. The family resided in the Saint Magdalena neighborhood, which was adjacent to the Santiago Neighborhood. The family's affinity for Maria Magdalena was deeply rooted in the Desclergues' historical connections with the Knight's Templars, as evidenced in Chapter 18.11.2. The church of Saint Magdalena, unfortunately, has deteriorated and is no longer accessible, but the nearby Santiago church is. Figure 30.7 depicts a Spanish tomb inside this church. Following Jeroni's demise, his wife Felipa de Montoya returned to Tournai to give birth to her youngest child, Miguel, and have him baptized there. She later married Jan Declercq (DK03), a widower from Kortrijk, and they resided together for the rest of her life in Deerlijk, where Jeroni and she also owned property.

Tournai, shown in Figures 30.5, 30.6, was essential in the time of the Spanish Netherlands. The town served as second-in-rank, after Cambrai, in the governance of the Southern part of Flanders. Besides, it was the capital of the Diocese of Tournai. Therefore, for historical, religious, and governmental reasons, Tournai was more critical than Kortrijk, which also belonged to the diocese of Tournai.

As described above, there were military barracks stretching from Kortrijk Pottelberg to Deerlijk, parallel to the Leie River. This area was connected to Tournai along a vital road, Kortrijk-Bellegem-Kooigem-Dottenijs-Tournai. It was also linked with Oudenaarde along a critical route that nowadays runs through Deerlijk (Stationsstraat) and Sint Lodewijk between Banhout forest and Brandemolen. Near this road, there were several lands of Overacker. However, we need to determine precisely where the Desclergues had property in Deerlijk. Due to the road connections, Tournai was near Deerlijk, Harelbeke, and Kortrijk and was easily reached from Ghent by the Schelde River.

30.6 Ostend

On the map in Figure 30.8, the importance of Ostend is evident. Its central location along the remaining coast of Flanders, on an island on the shore, and its strategic position to control the North Sea's access in competition with Calais and Dover is prominent. When the English and the Dutch occupied the city, this was unacceptable for the Spanish and the Catholic Spanish Netherlands. The stay of the Desclergues in Ostend is extensively described in Chapter 31.

30.7 Overacker in Deerlijk-Harelbeke

It is challenging to pinpoint the exact location of the Desclergues' property in Deerlijk or ascertain if they resided there during Jeroni's lifetime (DC05) or only later. We only know that their property was part of Overacker. Thanks to others' research and constructive comments from Jan Vanoverbeke, we have identified the lands in modern Deerlijk. Additionally, there are lands in Harelbeke and a few in Vichte. The locations mentioned are illustrated in Figure 30.10.

The Overacker lands in Deerlijk were spread across several areas, particularly between Tapuitstraat and Sint-Elooistraat, where the train station is now located. Other notable regions include Stasegemstraat, Brandstraat, Stationswijk, south of the Saint Columba church, and Braamakker. Further, lands between Wafelstraat and Olekenbosstraat and near Vanneste-Verweestraat and Kerkstraat beyond Heestertstraat towards Vichte are also part of this estate. One of these areas is shown in Figure 30.9. The primary reference to Overacker is Marianne Vermeulen's thesis.[2]

Upon the Desclergues' arrival in the area, they encountered a complex system of manors and parishes. Modern villages have evolved due to various mechanisms, including coagulation and inheritance. Typically, they still carry the manor's name that contained the church or parish. Deerlijk was the name of the manor where the modern Deerlijk church is located, and the parish covered what is now the commune of Deerlijk.

This area included lands owned by the Manor of Overacker. However, the manor was situated in Harelbeke, in the northeast corner, where the Leie River formed, and the Spaniards historically used the Beveren Creek for military barracks. Its location outside the town of Harelbeke means it did not give its name to the town. The manor had judicial headquarters in Harelbeke as well.

According to André Woestijn's study, "Harelbeke in de Spaanse tijd, 1585-1713," the Vierschaar (place where judges administered justice) of Overacker was located at the junction of Steenputstraat (now Forestierstraat) and the main road in Harelbeke (now Gentsestraat)[3]. This junction was the old road from Deerlijk to Harelbeke, near the manor. In 1626, an inn called De Bursse was located here, a term typically associated with large cities like Antwerp. The term Bursse or Beurs is believed to originate from the family name Van der Beurse in Bruges, where Joannes Van der Beurse established a regulated marketplace in 1453. The inn De Bursse in Harelbeke was purchased in 1599 or 1600 by Melchior Vanden Berghe from Thomaes De Ceuninck and later held by the heirs of Nicholas Vandeputte, who paid rent to Overacker. Subsequently, Simoen Mahieu paid this rent.

The manor owned lands in other parts of Harelbeke, including within the city borders, with homes and inns. The strategic location of the manor, combined with religious and financial reasons, fostered an alliance with the Spanish military, enabling them to construct military barracks along Beveren Creek and other fields. Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) or his widow, Felipa de Montoya, likely found purchasing property in Overacker territory inviting due to this alliance. Their acquaintance with the family of Jan Declercq (DK03) and Isabeau Braye in Kortrijk, who owned land in Deerlijk, may have also influenced their decision to buy property there.

Deerlijk, adjacent to Harelbeke and protected by the Leie River to the north and the Schelde River to the south, with the Gaverbeke Creek surrounding it, was a preferred residence for the Spanish military during inactivity. It was close to the Harelbeke military barracks (on Overacker lands and possibly neighboring fields) along the Beveren Creek. By the late 1500s, Deerlijk's northern area was agriculturally developed, while the south was made accessible for farming and habitation by the end of the 16th century. The Desclergue family bought property on Overacker lands near their friends, the Declercq family, whom they had known since their arrival in Kortrijk.

Deerlijk gained particular importance for the family after Jeroni's death when Felipa remarried the widower Jan Declercq (DK03). Either the property was rented to others, or they lived there or resided there occasionally. Chapter 34.13.7 is devoted to the Jan Declercq family. Thanks to him, Antoni and Miguel were well integrated into the local society despite their Spanish origins. The presence of the Spanish military was crucial from both military and geographical perspectives, especially after local forces reclaimed the area from the Calvinists around 1580. The Spanish troops' presence was necessary to maintain control and protect against potential threats from the French and Protestant forces.

Deerlijk was administratively part of the roede or 'verge' of Harelbeke, which was one of the few verges constituting the Castellany of Kortrijk, making Deerlijk an extension of Harelbeke, similar to a modern suburb. During Jeroni Desclergue's lifetime and his children's, Harelbeke and likely Deerlijk had inns where people could consume alcoholic beverages, pay bills, and make deals. Besides De Bursse, André Woestijn's study lists several inns in Harelbeke, including de Coyvot (the crowbar) and de Swaene (the swan), which was destroyed in 1602. Another inn, Den Inghele (the angel), was sold in 1606. Interestingly, an inn called den Rooden Hoet (the red hat) in 1602, later known as de Roose, likely evolved from the Spanish el sombrero rojo or el sombrero rosado.

Within Harelbeke, another inn called de Clocke (the clock) was located near Peperstraatje, owned by the city and sold to Overacker around 1578. Pieter Tytgat paid manor taxation to Harelbeke for owning the place, which was sold again in 1609 to Thomaes Le Mayeur.

Figure 30.11 shows a 1755 map close-up depicting French barracks on the Manor of Overacker along the Beveren Creek in Harelbeke, extending to Deerlijk's northwest corner. The Chemin de Courtray à Oudenarde road, shown on the map, illustrates the strategic location of Overacker, providing direct access to military camps. Despite the map being from a later period, it highlights the

It shows the area around the mill 'Brande Molen.' Although it's hard to estimate the scale, later maps show a different street plan; one of the L-shape roads on the right half of the map (grounds 150-157) may be nowadays 'Groenstraat.' Brande Molen is located at Oudenaardse Heerweg and the modern street called 'Vanneste Verwee.' The vertically oriented road in the middle is 'Oude Heerweg.' Interestingly, the area is almost adjacent to the current cemetery of Sint Lodewijk Deerlijk, where the family grave Declercq - de Silva is located and is the final resting place of three generations of Desclergues.*
Interestingly, grounds 158-159 is where Albert Buysschaert's farm was situated when this book's author was a child. He has visited this farm almost weekly with his father. This may have been where Antoni Desclergue (DC06) spent some of his youth, imagine! A description is found in Chapter 46. The map is found in Rijkaarchief Kortrijk, Kerkarchief Harelbeke, nr 15808, f. 41; it was published by Filip Benoit in 'Deerlijk en zijn inwonders vóór 1600, deel IV' , Derlike, 14de jaargang, nr 4, 1992.

enduring strategic importance of Overacker lands, initially chosen by the Spanish and later used by the French. The Chemin de Courtray à Gand road from Harelbeke through Deerlijk to Waregem, known as Waregemstraat, further emphasizes this strategic significance.

Chapter 31

The Desclergues during the Siege of Ostend

31.1 Introduction

The Spanish victory in Ostend is a moment of glory in history, albeit marked by the tragic loss of our paternal ancestor, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). For the occupying Calvinist Dutch and English forces, Ostend was a critical bridgehead for hostile operations in Flanders and served as a strategic point for coastal control. Such a 'Trojan horse' was intolerable for the Spanish and the Spanish Netherlands (modern-day Belgium). Consequently, the liberation of Ostend became imperative.

Notably, during this period, the Spanish army was considered the foremost modern military force globally. The Dutch, fully aware of Ostend's strategic importance, even referred to it as Troy.

In Figure 31.1, five Spanish soldiers are depicted. This image is also described by Rodríguez Hernández[1]. The soldier on the right is a piquero, identifiable by his red skirt. Beside him, dressed in white, is an arcabucero. Mounted on horses are three caballeros: on the right is a captain who is also an escopetero, in the center is a hombre de armas, and on the left is an arcabucero a caballo.

Martinez and Sánchez[2] note that,

'In principle, the soldiers of the Tercio had no uniform, as we understand the term today, but were required to wear a red band ('la banda roja') on the shell ('la coraza'), or, if lacking a cover, a cross or a blade was permanently sewn into the doublet. Red was the hallmark of the Catholic King's army and, consequently, of the Spanish infantry. At least in the first rows, Spanish soldiers' distinctive garment was a red band, while captains wore a red belt cinched at the waist, also called 'la faja roja.' For field masters and 'maestros general,' this band was extensive but still a band, as they were essentially captains.'

Rodríguez Hernández further elaborates that the cavalry was divided into three groups. The first group was the heavy cavalry, which fought with spears and was organized into spear companies. These men were well-protected with metal shields, although their horses were not. The second group comprised the cuirassiers, who used two pistols instead of spears and were followed by men wielding swords or other weapons. The third group consisted of arcabuceros on horseback, utilizing lighter horses and primarily armed with harquebuses that could be fired from horseback. The Spaniards were the first to introduce this light cavalry, which was highly mobile and suitable for special missions or quick interventions, though ineffective against heavily armored enemies.

The spear companies were remnants of the noble medieval world, with only a few such companies in Flanders' army. They typically served as custodians for dignitaries and military chiefs, composed of the social elite. Despite their instrumental role when deployed, their small numbers rendered them militarily insignificant and obsolete by this period in Flanders.

The most abundant group within the cavalry was the armored companies, akin to the old heavy cavalry. They usually did not charge the enemy but engaged in caracoles, a tactic where the cavalry would shoot at the enemy from a distance, then pull back to reload and return to the front to repeat the shooting. Unlike the infantry, they used short fuses on their guns due to the close-range nature of their combat and the necessity for swift action while on horseback. Over time, their weapons were replaced by more effective carbines, which were still inferior to the long-range and versatile musket.

It is conceivable that some modern Ostend residents may be patriotic, believing their ancestors fought against the Spanish long ago. However, caution is warranted. Current inhabitants of Ostend likely have no ancestors who lived there during that time. Most Ostend inhabitants relocated to Vlissingen in the Netherlands before and during the siege and never returned. Ostend, at that time, was under Protestant control.

The map of the Netherlands still needed to be divided into the Northern Republic and the Southern Spanish Netherlands; it was far more entangled. Some cities and territories were Spanish, while others were under the control of William of Orange. Ostend was one such insular enclave under Orange's supervision, though only partially. The Queen of England had occupied several towns, including Ostend, to secure military support from England. Thus, from the Spanish perspective, Ostend was held by Orange's rebels and even occupied by the English.

The city's strategic significance was due to its harbor, which enabled control of the North Sea and Spain's route to Antwerp. The Southern Netherlands, or Spanish Netherlands, naturally coveted the city. Indeed, as shown in Figure 31.2, when the Dutch blocked the entrance to Antwerp's harbor (1587-1795), the Belgians (inhabitants of the Austrian Netherlands) relied solely on Ostend's harbor for access to the world seas. The famous Ostend Company operated here, establishing trade routes with East India (e.g., Madras). More information on this topic can be found in Chapter 70.6.6.

31.2 The Early Stage of the Battle

The recapture of Ostend by Spanish forces was a formidable task, primarily due to the city's natural defenses, as illustrated in Figures 31.3 and 31.4. Philippe Fleming[3] noted in 1625 that in 1602, Joan de Ribas ('Johan de Ribas') was stationed at Ostend but served as the Governor of Cambrai.

Therefore, it is reasonable to assume that Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), who had participated in the siege and liberation of Cambrai, arrived in early spring of 1603 to support Joan de Ribas' efforts in Ostend. His arrival in Flanders after a brief stay in Barcelona is discussed in Chapter 29.5.27.

Besieging activities were typically conducted in the spring or summer. However, the strategic importance of Ostend likely necessitated a continuous effort, with peak activities in the spring and summer. During this period, Jeroni and his family probably frequently returned to their base in the Kortrijk-Deerlijk-Tournai region. Warfare in the 16th and 17th centuries differed significantly from modern warfare. The Spanish army in Flanders, comprising Spanish, German, Walloon, and Flemish troops, received annual payments for the duration of the war, ensuring a fixed income—contingent upon timely payments. Spanish troops were paid from Spain, while soldiers from Wallonia, Germany, or Flanders were compensated through local treasuries. While the amounts were similar, the sources and procedures differed.

Soldiers were often billeted with locals or, if financially able, purchased property and resided there. The use of barracks became common in the 17th century but was rare in the 16th century. Unmarried soldiers often shared houses or barracks with fellow soldiers. The Catalan term camarada ('comrade' or kameraad) originated during this period, referring to soldiers sharing the same room. Soldiers generally stayed in cities, towns, and small villages to distribute the burden on locals. Cultural exchange was common, as shown in Figure 31.22. Military campaigns typically began in spring after a winter of rest, often involving the siege and liberation of towns. Sieges usually lasted a few weeks, but if a quick victory was unattainable, the city would be surrounded until the inhabitants starved and surrendered. Assaults were severe and decisive.

Ostend presented unique challenges. The incoming tide flooded the area around the city, and it was rare for the sea to recede enough to provide dry ground between the city and the mainland. Defensive constructions fortified the roads to the town, and canals further complicated assaults.

apturing Ostend was technically challenging, as the Dutch and British navies continuously supplied the city with fresh troops, money, food, beverages, prostitutes, weapons, and soldiers. The Spanish forces faced a relentless struggle, akin to "mopping with the tap open," as the Flemish saying goes.

The British indirectly controlled the city by providing financial and military support to the Dutch, which allowed them to dominate the North Sea. Ostend enabled the Dutch and British to control access routes to Sluis and Antwerp and permitted Dutch rebels to attack Flanders' mainland.

Consequently, the city was surrounded by small Spanish fortresses to defend against assaults. Conquering Ostend was also a matter of prestige, with all of Europe closely monitoring the seemingly impossible endeavor. The Dutch exacerbated the situation by attacking the Spanish in various locations, such as Sluis and Brabant, to divert Spanish efforts from Ostend.

On January 7, 1602, the Spanish launched an assault on Ostend, attempting to capture the city, as depicted in Figures 31.19 and 31.20. The attack was partially successful, particularly at the fortification of San Antoni in the northeast of Ostend, near Bredene, which was met with enthusiasm by the Spanish. This event might have inspired the naming of a son, Antoni, who was baptized on June 26, 1602, in Tournai. Maps show that Fort Albertus and Fort Isabella were operational again. The evolution of the battlefield is detailed in Figures 31.5, 31.7, 31.9, 31.10, 31.12, 31.14, 31.16, 31.17, 31.18, and 31.21. Environmental impressions are provided in Figures 31.6, 31.8, 31.11, and 31.15. A depiction of a military camp during the siege of Ostend is shown in Figure 31.13.

31.3 The Late and Final Stages of the Battle and the Death of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05)

For several reasons, the protracted Siege of Ostend ultimately exhausted the Dutch forces, rendering its defense too costly. Firstly, by 1600, the Dutch realized that the Flemish population no longer sympathized with Calvinism and were weary of the constant military threat at the border between the Spanish Netherlands and the Dutch Netherlands. Most Calvinist sympathizers had fled, leaving a predominantly Catholic population with no intention of converting. While the Dutch had the resources to support a liberation effort, they lacked the capacity for a prolonged occupation.

Additionally, the Dutch, in a strategic move, believed that Ostend could be exchanged for Sluis in negotiations with the Spanish. They prioritized certainty over uncertainty, opting to relinquish Ostend to secure Sluis.

Historical records suggest that the Dutch anticipated the possibility of reclaiming Ostend in the future if necessary. Militarily, the occupying forces in Ostend were in dire straits, having retreated to the inner city and being overwhelmed by Spanish forces. The final stronghold, referred to as 'New Troy,' alluded to Greek history and the fall of Troy, symbolizing Ostend as a Trojan horse for attacking Flanders.

Ultimately, the Dutch, after a valiant defense, surrendered and peacefully evacuated Ostend, receiving safe conduct to Sluis and Vlissingen. Remarkably, the Spanish even allowed them to transport their cannons.

With Ostend liberated from the rebels, Spanish forces eliminated the foreign armies, resolving a critical issue symbolized by the 'thorn in the foot of the Leo Belgicus'—a reference to Ostend's depiction at the time.

The phrase Ostendam initia pacis, meaning '(only) at Ostend peace could begin,' underscored Ostend's significance for both the Spanish and the Belgians.

Numerous books have been written about the Siege of Ostend, including several reliable contemporary sources. A modern, equally reliable work that focuses on the army residing in the city during the conflict is Werner Thomas's book[4]. However, it is essential to note that, despite the current inhabitants' pride, almost no one lived in Ostend during the siege. The population had been evacuated to Vlissingen and never returned. The city was occupied by military personnel and contract workers tasked with repairing damaged installations on a rotational basis. Nonetheless, the siege resulted in significant loss of life, not only due to warfare but also disease. Massive explosions, depicted in Figure 31.30, occurred on the southwest side of Ostend, where Spanish forces concentrated their power. Military operations were launched from the fortresses of Santa Maria, also known as 'Jeronimo de Monroy' and Rivas. The reader may also refer to Figure 37.55 on page 655. Jeroni Desclergue led attempts to capture Porcopino and Sandhill, where he ultimately perished.

Jeronimo de Monroy, a relative of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), through his biological mother, Maria Ana Cortés de Monroy, also participated in the siege. As noted in Figure 31.31, Jeronimo de Monroy was killed in 1601[5]. Figures 31.23, 31.24, 31.25, 31.26, 31.27, 31.28, and 31.29 present maps and depictions of the ongoing developments of the Siege of Ostend until its conclusion.

31.4 Sandhill in Ostend, where Jeroni was Killed

Figures 31.32, 31.33, and 31.34 depict Sandhill in Ostend, the location where Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) perished during an assault, which culminated in a Spanish victory. In Christophle de Bonours' book from 1628[6], we read at the beginning of Chapter 29 in Figures 29.6 and 29.7 on page 370,

Camp Master Antuñes (who resided at Tournai, like Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05)), having advanced enormously towards the new fortification of the Besieged, caved a mine, which he opened with fire at the beginning of September. The endeavor was so successful that an enemy English Lieutenant named Benetton, a Sergeant, and about forty Soldiers were buried alive when it was opened. A Spanish Captain named Don Jeronimo Desclergue (DC05) ('Don Ieronimo de Cleriges') had seen the opening and advanced promptly with his company to fortify it on the breach and followed the order of the Camp Master. However, he reached the breach so soon that the Besieged ignited another explosion, which buried all men alive, namely the Captain, the Ensign, the Sergeant, and all Soldiers.'

The text does not specify the location of the breach. For further details, we refer to the work of Adrianus van Meerbeeck[7], illustrated in Figures 31.35, 31.36, 31.37, 31.38, and 31.39, which states,

'In the meantime, the Spaniards had burst two mines on the Ostend raveline, called Porcospino, and they had chased the 'Geuzen' out and then taken the raveline.'

The term Porcospino is Italian for Stekelvarken in Dutch or Porcupine in English. This marked the initial phase of a series of Spanish successes, beginning on May 28, 1604. Following this, a diplomatic episode related to Sluis occurred. For details on this event, refer to the career of Enric Desclergue (DC05c) described in Chapter 33.3.6.

When peace was signed at Sluis, the Spanish feared that the Dutch would reinforce Ostend, prompting them to accelerate their efforts. The next target was Sandhill, located at the West harbor, near the modern-day Casino, as shown in Figure 31.41 on page 488.

Jeroni died on September 4, with Sandhill falling on September 13. This breakthrough marked the downfall of Ostend, which completely collapsed by September 19, with the entire city captured. The explosion on September 4 also severely injured Jeroni's brother, Enric Desclergue (DC05c), as detailed in Chapter 33. Despite severe injuries, including disembowelment, he survived. Adrianus van Meerbeeck's work highlights the intense final battles characterized by extensive use of mines and explosives.

31.5 Colombye, San Miguel and the Pregnant Widow

While Jeroni Desclergue, his wife Felipa De Montoya, and their son Antoni Desclergue were in Ostend during the spring, summer, and early fall, they resided in the area controlled by the Kingdom of Spain. Meanwhile, the city was under the control of the States of the Northern Netherlands and the English rebels. The exact location of their residence in Ostend remains to be determined. However, likely, the Catalan soldiers of the Spanish army were mainly stationed in and around the inland-directed Spanish fortress of Colom (Fort Colombye), also known as the fortress of San Miguel (Sint Michiel) due to a chapel within the fortress dedicated to San Miguel.

As illustrated in Figure 31.42, the fort was probably named after 'Cristòfor Colom,' the Catalan version of 'Cristóbal Colón,' or Christopher Columbus. Nonetheless, we cannot exclude the possibility of a reference to Saint Columba of Sens, depicted in Figure 31.43, who was revered in places such as Deerlijk. Analyzing her legend reveals striking parallels that Spanish Catholics may have identified with.

Saint Columba was born in Spain in the 3rd century and fled to Northern France to escape Roman persecution. She was captured and forced to reside in a brothel, where a bear protected her to preserve her purity. This story might have resonated with the Spanish Catholics in Flanders, who likely felt similarly besieged.

Moreover, Santa Coloma was also worshipped in a town near Montblanc in Spain (Santa Coloma de Queralt).

It is likely at Fort Colombye that Miguel Desclergue, Jeroni's last child, was conceived. Miguel was born posthumously, probably in the spring of 1605, and was baptized in Tournai on September 30, the feast day of Saint Hieronymus (Jeroni).

The fortress of Colombye was constructed by Joan de Ribas, a name still prevalent in modern Catalonia. Ribas later became the governor of Ostend after the Siege. The Spanish erected several small fortresses around Ostend to contain the city, preventing rebel attacks on the mainland and quick reinforcement by Dutch rebel troops from Sluis. Consequently, Ostend was isolated from the land but remained connected to the sea, as previously described. Ostend maintained continuous connections with Vlissingen.

Interestingly, Joan de Ribas is recorded as whose daughter Catalina de Ribas married Pedro Garcia Pie Redonda, son of Andes Garcia Pie Redonda and Maria Gutierrez, on June 8, 1602, in Santander, Spain. The ceremony occurred at the San Miguel Church in San Miguel de Aras, near Santander in Cantabria, Spain. If Joan de Ribas is the same individual, he may have named the chapel at Colombye Fortress after his hometown.

31.6 Legacy of the Siege of Ostend

The book 'La nouvelle Troye ou memorable histoire du siege d' Ostende leus signalé qu' on ait veu en l' Europe .. avec ce qui s' est passé par chascun jour durant ledit siege depuis le 5 Juin 1601 jusqu' au 20 Septembre. 1604 qu' elle fut renduë: recoeuillie des plus asseurés memoires par Henry Haestens,' meticulously chronicles the siege, detailing events on a month-by-month basis. It reports that approximately 50000 men perished on each side, with about 500 captains among the casualties. Additionally, the account notes the detonation of roughly 70 mines during the conflict. One of the final mines, which exploded in September 1604, resulted in the death of our paternal ancestor, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05).

[a] The tide significantly impacts coastal vegetation, leading to the formation of mudflats and salt marshes, known as 'slikken' and 'schorren' respectively. Tides are the periodic changes in water level and the associated tidal currents that occur on Earth, primarily due to the gravitational pull of the Moon, with a lesser contribution from the Sun. This fundamental insight was first articulated by Isaac Newton in 1687.

In 1740, Daniel Bernoulli extended Newton's theory to include the concept of the equilibrium tide, which is often mistakenly attributed to Newton himself. Pierre-Simon Laplace made further advancements in 1776, developing a dynamic approach to understanding tides. Subsequent contributions to tide analysis and forecasting were made by William Thomson (Lord Kelvin) in 1867, George Howard Darwin in 1899, and Arthur Thomas Doodson in 1921.

Tidal variations are influenced by several factors, including the distance from the equator, water depth, and the shape of the coastline, which is particularly significant for Ostend. Additionally, tides are affected by air pressure and wind conditions. In Ostend, the average difference between high and low tide is approximately 5 meters.

Die twè ſckitten deur jin gatt.

Figure 31.22: In 1960, Luc A. Vandebogaerde published a brief article in 'Het A. B. K. of het Algemeen Beskaaft Kortriks,' exploring the linguistic history of Kortrijk. In this article, he reproduced a copper engraving from 1664, depicted on the left, bearing the inscription, "Die twè sckitten deur jin gatt," which translates to "those two poop through the same hole." In the Kortrijk dialect, this phrase is equivalent to saying, 'those two share the same opinion.' Vandebogaerde further noted that the Dutchman Jan van Doetinchem found this Kortrijk saying so intriguing that he created the copper engraving in 1664. Van Doetinchem, born in Zutphen where he served as a town scribe, documented in 1698: "Het Kortriks is eene echte Vlamske taele" (The Kortrijk dialect is a genuine Flemish language).
Evidently, Jan van Doetinchem considered the Kortrijk expression unique. This phrase must have originated in Kortrijk or been introduced there by foreigners, including Catalans.
A 'caganer' is depicted on the right side, a traditional figure in Catalan nativity scenes. The term 'caganer' literally translates to 'the defecator' or 'the pooper.' The tradition of incorporating a 'caganer' into nativity scenes dates back to the 18th century and is deeply embedded in Catalan culture. However, the concept of the 'caganer' and its linguistic applications in Catalan predate the creation of these figurines. For instance, old Catalan expressions such as "són cul I merda" reflect similar ideas and translate to "they are butt and poop," humorously implying that two individuals are inseparable and consistently in agreement, akin to the intrinsic connection between the backside and its product.
Therefore, it is plausible that the 17th-century expression from Kortrijk has Catalan origins. Indeed, this idiom embodies the Catalan inclination for direct, earthy humor and practicality—traits that have long been integral to the culture.

Limanda, or dab, distinguishes itself from other flatfish by its curved lateral line above the pectoral fin and lacks bumps on the head and lateral line. Its serrated scales give the skin a rough texture like sandpaper when brushed up. Dab typically measures 30 cm long, schooling and avoiding fresh water at estuaries. They inhabit depths of 20 to 40 meters, often caught best from boats but accessible from piers, jetties, and breakwaters during winter when they move to shallow coastal waters. Chapter 32

Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b)

32.1 Introduction

Don Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) was the brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and should not be confused with Jeroni's son, our ancestor, Don Antoni Desclergue (DC06). The ancestral situation and blood-relationship of Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) is made clear in Figures 32.1, 32.2 and 32.3.

To a large extent, one should read this chapter together with Chapter 33. The reason is that Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) and Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c), two half-brothers, had their careers simultaneously and stayed pretty much together or in the same areas during their time in Flanders until their death. They were brothers of our ancestor Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05).

Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) y Ratera was a son of Don Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04) and Anna (II) Ratera. He was a half-brother of Jeroni and Enric Desclergue and a brother of Francesc Desclergue (DC05e) y Ratera and Francisca Desclergue (DC05d) y Ratera. On pages 179-180 of URTX índex onomàstic Personatges històrics, we find,

'Desclergue, Antoni (militar): VII, 68'[1].

32.2 His Career

We shall begin with the description of Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) by showing handwritten accounts by Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue in 1661, in Figures 32.4 and 32.5. Although Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) had reached the rank of captain and sometimes served side by side with his brother Enric, there are no indications of particular notable achievements. He had a brief career in Milan, followed by a relatively short career in Flanders, a short career in Barcelona and Gerona afterward, and retired in Flanders. He died in Ghent in 1634.

Of particular note are the two handwritten letters by Infanta Doña Isabel, a testament to the esteem in which Antoni Desclergue was held. One was addressed to his Majesty, and the other to the Duke of Lerma (Francisco Gómez de Sandoval y Rojas, 1st Duke of Lerma, 5th Marquess of Denia, 1st Count of Ampudia, 1552-1625), in which she unequivocally affirmed Antoni Desclergue's exemplary service to His Majesty. This recognition from such a prominent figure adds a layer of intrigue to his story.

Our journey into Antoni Desclergue's military career begins in Milan, as evidenced by a certificate issued in Valladolid on November 24, 1602, by His Majesty. This document commanded the Count of Fuentes, Governor and Captain-General in that state, to pay a monthly salary of eight escudos extra to Antoni, who was serving in the Spanish infantry. This early stage of his career piques our curiosity about the experiences and challenges he might have faced.

The fragment in Figure 32.7 states that Antoni Desclergue later showed his courage in Flanders, where, like his brothers Jeroni (DC05) and Enric (DC05c), he was also a captain of the Spanish infantry, as stated by a patent of His Highness Alberto Archduke of Austria, the Duke of Burgundy and Captain-General of the army of His Majesty, given in Brussels on January 7, 1606.

32.2.1 Recruitment and service in Milan

The reader may be interested in consulting Figure 28.4 on page 338. Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) was born at Montblanc in Spain and died in Ghent. He was a Doncel. Antoni Desclergue (DC05b), just as his brother Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), followed a career in the army, which he began in 1601 in Milan.

32.2.2 Ostend

From the Milanesat, he went to Flanders, where he participated in Ostend's Siege, where he became a lieutenant, as found in Figure 32.8.

32.2.3 Damme

On January 7, 1606, he was appointed captain of a Tercio company of Simón Antúnez[2]. Antoni Desclergue (I) (DC05b) was located in Damme, shown in Figures 32.9 and 32.10. Simón Antúnez would be, after the truce between Spain and the Northern Netherlands was signed in April 1609, in command of the departmental Tercio of Flanders stationed in Mechelen and surroundings.

Fuentes, Paul-Bernard de Fontaines (1566 Lorraine - May 19, 1643, Rocroi), also known as Comtefontaine and Conde Fontana, shown in Figure 32.12, was in charge of Damme before and during the truce between the Dutch States and the Spanish Netherlands (1609-1621). He sponsored the installation of a beautiful altar in the church, as seen in Figures 32.12 and 32.13. Fuentes had fought with the three Desclergues years and decades before, especially Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), as found in Chapter 29.5. He transformed Damme into a fortified town to confront the walled Dutch city of Sluis a few km north. While Fuentes was active in Damme, we located Antoni Desclergues in Damme, as found next. Note that Chapter 29 mentions that this Fuentes should not be confused with Pedro Henriquez d' Azevedo y Alvarez de Toledo, the Count of Fuentes, who was a statesman.

It is also interesting to know that many years later, when Fuentes was already an older man, the son of Antoni's brother Jeroni, namely Antoni Desclergues (II) (DC06), would be involved, with Fuentes, in military activities against France, such as the battle of

She appears one time as Catharina Desclergue in a document in 1576 (Montblanc) in which it would have been harmful to reveal her true identity being a Cortés. The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortés.

Rocroi in 1643, explained in Chapter 34.6, where the Spanish were defeated and where Fuentes died. The chair on which Fuentes was moved around and on the battlefield can still be seen at the Military Museum at l' Hotel des Invalides in Paris. The grave of Fuentes was in Bruges in the monastery church of the Order of Friars Minor. The monastery and church were later destroyed during the French occupation.

There is amply evidence of Antoni's (DC05b) stay at Damme, witnessed by the Spanish and by local ecclesiastical documents as in Figure 32.14. Several certificates in Damme are highly likely linked to the military because it was at the frontier with the Dutch States, who had taken Sluis from the Spanish Netherlands. Some examples are shown in Figures 32.15, 32.16. Another family branch equally passed by Damme, as explained in Chapter 71.

Luis de Zúñiga y Requeséns was born in Barcelona on August 25, 1528, and died in Brussels on March 5, 1576. He was the governor of the Habsburg Netherlands. His descendants were also involved in the governance and military in the Netherlands. One of the descendants, or a relative through his mother Estefania de Requeséns, appears at a baptism in Bruges in 1611, namely Pere Requeséns, whose daughter replaced Juana de Molinero as godmother on the baptism of the child of a Spanish military in Damme, shown in Figure 32.17.

Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) was known in Damme until at least the 1620s. Indeed, he was referred to on Martina de la Cruz's baptism, to whom Antoni Desclergue (DC06) 'junior' acted as godfather in 1624. We refer to Chapter 37.4 for more information.

Interestingly, Martina de la Cruz later married Antoni (DC07), Jeroni's grandson and Antoni's (DC06) son. The Spanish clan was very tight in the first half of the 17th century.

Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) was in Spain in 1615.

A source is found, shown in Figure 32.18, related to Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) in Barcelona in the year 1615, written by the Marquis of Almaçán.[3]

32.2.5 Antwerp, with his brother Enrique (DC05c) and the onset of the 30-year War

Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) and his half-brother, Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c), resided in Antwerp from 1617 to 1618 (see also Chapter 33. The Desclergue brothers and their families relocated to Antwerp to live at the Spanish-held castle amidst escalating tensions in Europe. These tensions stemmed from conflicts over religious liberty in Eastern Europe, guided by the principle that the populace adopted the religion of their ruler. Consequently, some regions adhered to Lutheranism while others remained Catholic.

In response to Islam's growing influence, alliances were formed to consolidate geographical and political power, which heightened tensions. The situation deteriorated significantly when Archduke Ferdinand fought with the Lutherans in Austria around 1609. In 1617, Ferdinand sought to revoke the religious freedoms of the Hussites in Bohemia, a move that precipitated the Thirty Years' War outbreak in May 1618.

Ferdinand's election as Emperor Ferdinand II in March 1619 solidified his position as the undisputed leader of the Catholic faction in the war.

Chapter 34.5.6 discusses the roles of Carlos Coloma, Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b), and Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c) in these events.

32.3 Spouse

Antoni Desclergue lost his wife Ana while they resided in Antwerp in 1618, as shown in Figure 32.19.

32.4 His Death at Ghent

At the end of his career, Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) must have been promoted to a comfortable position as captain at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent. He was hospitalized at the military hospital of Bijloke, where he passed away on June 30, 1634, shown in Figure 32.20, three years after his brother Enric (1631 at Wingene) and 30 years after his brother Jeroni (1604 at Ostend).

32.5 His Offspring

We found no evidence that Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) had offspring that survived after the end of the 17th century.

At the end of his career, Antoni Desclergue possibly settled in Wingene-Tielt, between Damme and Kortrijk-Deerlijk-Tournai, where the descendants of Jeroni (DC05) lived. He was later promoted to a position at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent. It's only guessing. The referred area was not strange to the military. In a slightly earlier period, there is, for instance, a military in the Spanish army from Lorraine, reported in the literature,[4] describes how a soldier from Lorraine appeared in Wingene around 1600 and stayed there. Lorraine was part of the Spanish Empire.

Antoni's legacy may have been carried on by his potential children: Pere, Joan, Jose, and Francisca. While we have not delved deeper into their lives, their existence presents an intriguing avenue for further research.

32.5.1 Pere Desclergue

In 1630, we found the wedding, in Figure 32.21, of Petrus Desclergue, who married Joanna Courtoys. Petrus was the son of Antoni Desclergue, although Antoni did not appear to be a witness. There are also interesting baptisms shown in Figures 32.22 and 32.23

32.5.2 Joan Desclergue

About Figure 32.24, Juana De Clergue may have been a daughter or new wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) after the death of his wife Ana in 1618. Note that the 'De Vos (Vosa)' family also appears in connection to the Desclergues and the Spanish army at Deerlijk; see, for instance, Chapter 29 and Part X. As described in Chapter 36, Joan Desclergue, son of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b), was a witness to a wedding at the Spaniard castle of Ghent in 1674, together with Joan Francesc Declerque (DC07c), son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06). It shows that the different Desclergue branches maintained contacts during the 17th century.

32.5.3 Francisca Desclergue

Earlier, in 1632, at Tielt, we found the wedding, in Figure 32.25, of Petrus Bruneel, son of a soldier Judocus Bruneel, who married Francisca Desclergue, daughter of Antonius Desclergue.

32.5.4 Jose Desclergue

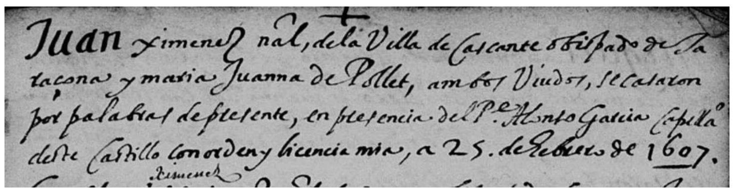
Another son of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) was Jose. He married first at Wingene in 1629, in Figure 32.26, to an Irish Gertrude Cobain and married, after her death, to Jacomina Bocoute at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent, in Figures 32.27 and 32.28. The residence at the Spaniard Castle, shown in Figure 32.32, is also consistent with the fact that Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) died there in 1634.

32.5.5 Maria Desclergue

We have no evidence, but we cannot exclude either, that Maria Desclergue was the daughter of Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b). She married in Brussels in 1631, Fredericus Morales, shown in Figure 32.29 on page 499.

32.6 The appearance of Maria Juana Pollet

In Chapter 32.5.1 about Pere Desclergue, we had referred to Maria Pollet on the baptism of Petrus Desclergue, son of Petrus and Joanna Courtoys, at Wingene on March 9, 1631, when she acted as godmother. Maria Joana Pollet was married at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent in 1607, in Figure 32.30, to Juan Ximenez, possibly related to the Ximenez de la Cruz family of whom a daughter, Martina, would marry Jeroni Desclergues's grandson Antoni Desclecque (DC07), described in Chapter 37.4. She had a son, Francisco, born the year after, as seen in Figure 32.31.



Juan Ximenez nat. de la Villa de Cascante obispado de Tarazona y maria Juanna de Pollet, ambos Viudos, se casaron por palabras de presente, en presencia del P.e Alonso Garcia Capellan deste Castillo con orden y licencia mia, a 25. de Deziembre de 1607.

Chapter 33

Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c)

33.1 Introduction

Enric Desclergue y Cortés was a brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) y Cortés and a half-brother of Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) y Ratera, Francesc Desclergue (DC05e) y Ratera and Francisca Desclergue (DC05d) y Ratera. He was also the uncle of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), the son of Jeroni (DC05). Enric Desclergue y Cortés is also known as Enrique Desclergues. He was born in Montblanc, Spain. He died in 1631 at Wingene in Belgium. To a large extent, one should read this chapter together with Chapter 32. The reason is that Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c) and Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b), two half-brothers, had their careers simultaneously and stayed pretty much together or in the same areas during their time in Flanders until their death. They were brothers of our ancestor Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). Enric Desclergue (DC05c) y Cortés was a son of Don Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04) and Maria Anna Desclergue (DC02dx1), who was a daughter of Galceran Desclergue (I=II) (DC02d), a distant relative of Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04) y Cortés, and Ana de Villavicencio. On pages 179-180 of URTX índex onomàstic Personatges històrics, we find,
'DESCLERGUE, Enric (militar): VII, 67, 68.'
We also find a good description of the life of Enric Desclergue (DC05c) in Santiago Alberti.[1]

33.2 His Recruitment

The reader may be interested in consulting Figure 28.4 on page 338. He followed in the footsteps of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). On December 1, 1603, he became a soldier in Flanders, where he served in the company of his brother Jeroni.

33.3 His Career

The Arxiu Comarcal Urgell in Spain preserved the archives of the families Desclergue and de Pedrolo. Before we describe the career of Enric Desclergue y Cortés in more detail, we shall first show three such references.

33.3.1 Handwritten reference 1

The fragments in Figures 33.5 and 33.6 describe Enric Desclergue.
He served His Majesty in Flanders from December 11, 1603, onward, when he joined the armed forces in the infantry company of his brother, Captain Jeroni Desclergue, in the tercio of Maestre de Campo Don Iñigo de Borja y Velasco (1575-1622), in which he served until May 4, 1604.
Then, he continued under Captain Don Miguel Valverra of the same Tercio until September 15, 1604. Then, he continued with Don Gaspar de Castello of the same Tercio. His salary was 30 escudos per month. He served until January 15, 1605, and passed to Maestro de Campo Simón Antúnez from January 30, 1605, onward, part of the company of Pedro Medrano of the same Tercio, in which he remained until March 20, 1605.
Consequently, he was promoted to the company of Captain Antonio de Parida of the tercio of Maestro de Campo Don Alonso de Luna. He served until June 1606, when he could form his own company as captain. He received the company that had belonged to Captain Gaspar de Valdés, of the Tercio of Maestre de Campo Simón Antúnez. His salary was then 44 escudos per month with four extra escudos.
The information was found in the books of Gonzalo Guerra de la Paz, the accountant of the Army of Flanders, in Brussels on July 20, 1622.

33.3.2 Handwritten reference 2

This fragment, shown in Figures 33.7 and 33.8, cites a letter by Simón Antúnez, governor and commander of Santa Maria de Arias of the order of Christ, member of the Council of War of His Majesty, and 'Maestro de Campo' of the Spanish infantry.
Enric Desclergue ('Enrique Desclergue') came to Flanders to serve His Majesty. He served until 1623 for more than 20 years.
For instance, in the Dutch wars, he was one of the pikes in the squadron in the relief of 's Hertogenbosch (Balduque). When he was deployed in Ostend, he performed very well and was among those who penetrated the fortification on September 4, 1604. He successfully finished the attack on Ostend in which his brother Jeroni Desclergue was killed. The mine that killed Jeroni and half of the company wounded Enric heavily in the head and the belly. He had to hold his guts in his hand and was seemingly at the end of his life.
In the wars in the Eastern Provinces (Frisa), he successfully captured the towns of Lochem (Locomo) and Groenlo (Grol). Simón Antúnez witnessed his outstanding actions with Captain Manuel Francisco de Vanguardia when he broke the fortification and captured the inner town. From there, he was ordered to capture Rheinberg (Rimberg), where he stormed the fortress with uttermost courage. While the city was besieged, on September 26, 1606, the Germans made a 'sortie' to the trenches where Enric was, and a pike severely wounded him in his arm and a bullet in the head. He was bandaged but was again seemingly at the end of his life.
Enric also contributed significantly to the Siege of Groenlo (Grol) and, before that, of Sluis (la Esclusa / Enclusa).

The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortès, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortès.

He also took part in the battles in the areas of Gulik (Juliers , or Jülich) and Kleef (Cleves or Clevesson). He won in Aachen (Aquisgrán, which in this manuscript appears as A Tisgrana), and Wesel (Vesel), where he was stationed at a fort at Rees (Res) far from the main camp.

Because of his extraordinary leadership and bravery, Enric received a patent from the Marquis of Spinola to lead, as captain, four companies in Flanders and Germany. It was under his leadership that Jülich (Gulik or Juliers) was successfully besieged and that the towns of Lembeck (Lembeque), Rees (Rese), and Goch were captured. Enric Desclergue escorted three companies, that of Diego Mexía Felípez de Guzmán y Dávila, 1st Marques de Leganes (Don Diego Messia) and that of Simón Antúnez to about 1 mile from the enemy. It was comparable to the excursion to Algiers (Argel), when Andrea Doria was in charge, while Don Juan de Cardona carried the flag.

Enric Desclergue was a courageous captain for many years. Although merely a handful of examples were listed above, Simón Antúnez was proud to sign and seal the eulogy in Mechelen on March 29, 1623.

Concerning the Spanish attempts to conquer Algiers, some interesting references are found that indicate the involvement of Spanish military from Flanders.

One can make reference to Jeronimo Conestaggio's work, shown in Figure 33.32, titled 'Relation des préparatifs faits pour surprendre Alger' from 1882. In this text, Conestaggio mentions the presence of adventurers, individuals of significant importance. He specifically says the Duke of Parma, who arrived with a contingent of two hundred Knights, his vassals, and experienced soldiers from Flanders. This publication is also found in Marco Ramerini's paper[23]

The jornadas of Arzel in Algiers were overseen by Prince Andrea Doria and Don Juan de Cardona. There were two expeditions, or rather attempts at expeditions, with the primary goal of conquering the city of Algiers in North Africa. During that period, Algiers served as a hub for piracy, as maritime vessels belonging to European naval forces navigating the Mediterranean Sea were targeted and attacked. The incursions perpetrated by pirates resulted in significant detrimental effects on commercial activities within the Mediterranean region. The primary strongholds of these pirates were situated along the Mediterranean coastline of northern Africa, including the urban centers of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli.

The maritime vessels belonging to the monarch of Spain were prominently targeted during these invasions. Spain attempted to address this issue by launching expeditions to conquer the fortresses.

As per the historical record, it is noted that in 1601, Philip III, the reigning monarch of Spain, sent a naval fleet consisting of 70 galleys accompanied by an army exceeding ten thousand soldiers. Prince Gian Andrea Doria led this expedition, alternatively referred to as Andrettino Doria and Juan Andrea Doria (1539-1606) in Spanish documentation. Gian Andrea Doria, a notable naval commander, was from Genoa and was the direct descendant of the renowned Andrea Doria (1466-1560).

The document above, by Jeronimo Conestaggio,[4] references many individuals involved in the expedition. Notably, it notes the participation of the Duke of Parma, who, along with a contingent of two hundred knights comprised of seasoned troops from Figure 33.32: The book of Geronimo Conestaggio, describing the first attempt to conquer Algiers in 1601 in which Enric Desclergue (DC05c) was likely involved, or in the attempt just after that.

Flanders, departed on the galley named 'Capitana' under the command of Carlo Doria. One of the notable persons mentioned is Virginio Orsino, the Duke of Bracciano, aboard the galley named 'Capitana' of Florence. During the voyage on the Royal galley, several notable individuals were present, including the Marquis of Elche, the eldest son of the Duke of Macheda.

Additionally, Alo Idiaqués, who served as the general of the light cavalry of the State of Milan and was chosen by Gian Andrea Doria as his lieutenant, was also on board. Other distinguished figures included Diego Pimentel, Manuel Mantiques (the Grand Commander of Aragon), the Count of Celano, the Marquis de Garesfi, Ercole Gonzaga, Gio Geromino Doria, Aurelio Tagliacarne, and a few other captains and esteemed individuals. Furthermore, the group included seven or eight Roman gentlemen.

The military operation on August 30, 1601, was deemed unsuccessful since it encountered a significant obstacle in adverse weather conditions, rendering the intended landing unattainable. The fleet convened at Mallorca on September 3, 1601, planning to coordinate the assault.

However, this endeavor was again unsuccessful due to unfavorable wind conditions. The whole undertaking was terminated.

A further endeavor was undertaken in 1602, starting from Cadiz and passing via Mallorca.

33.3.3 Handwritten reference 3

This fragment, shown in Figure 33.9 and Figure 33.10, says that there are many more certifications of the qualities of Enric Desclergue (DC05c) than the ones of Simón Antúnez (Ostend, October 12, 1604) and patents on March 20, 1605, in Brussels.

For instance, Sergeant Major Baltazar López, Lieutenant General of the Maestro de Campo, testified on Enric's qualities in Ostend on October 13, 1604.

Captain Don Lorenzo Villavicencio, an infantry sergeant major in the Spanish tercio of Maestro de Campo Don Juan de Meneses, attested in Ostend on October 29, 1604. Captain Don Lorenzo Villavicencio was a distant cousin of Enric Desclergue, as outlined in Chapter 25.1.3.2.

On December 13, 1604, his Highness Cardinal Archduke Albert expressed Enric's qualifications in Brussels, and again on January 10, 1606. The specific statements also included eulogies for Jeroni Desclergue and are shown in his Chapter 29.

Also, Don Juan de Meneses, knight of the order of Santiago and member of the Council of War of his Majesty, and Maestro de Campo of the Spanish infantry in Flanders, testified in Brussels on March 20, 1617.

We can also mention the testimony of Domingo Ximenes, member of the council of War of his Majesty and the Governor of the town of Nieuwpoort (Newport), on March 20, 1623, who mentioned that Enric Desclergue had served for 22 years in the army.

Note that Domingo Ximenes, as outlined in Chapter 37.4.2, was married to Elena de la Cruz in Valladolid in Spain in 1564, and they were the parents of Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz, who married Maria de Sapena in Granada in 1596. Their daughter was Martina de la Cruz, born in Dudzele in 1624, a village adjacent to Damme in Flanders, close to Sluis and Bruges.

33.3.4 Íñigo de Borja y Velasco

As can be read in the above shown evidence, Enric Desclergue was, at the beginning, in the tercio of Don Íñigo de Borja y Velasco (1575–1622), until 1604. He was born at Gandía in 1575 as the son of Francisco Tomás de Borja y Centelles, the sixth Duke of Gandia. His grandfather was Íñigo Fernández de Velasco, the 2nd Duke of Frías. His brother, Gaspar de Borja y Velasco, was the archbishop of Toledo and Seville.

He married a Flemish, Hélène de Hénín-Liétard, the daughter of the Marquess of Veere. Early in his career, he became a Knight of the Order of Santiago and held the commandery of Membrilla. He served H.M. King Felipe II of Spain in France and Burgundy in the 1590s and after 1598 in northern Italy. He went to Flanders in 1603, with 3700 militaries along the Spanish Road, described in Chapter 8.10, to serve Archduke Albert. Enric Desclergue (DC05c) belonged to his tercio until 1604. Later, in 1605, he led the Antwerp garrison and stopped the Dutch from taking Antwerp.

During his military career, he participated in the 1606 Siege of Groenlo, just like Enric Desclergue (DC05c), and became an artillery general in the Army of Flanders. He governed the Antwerp Citadel from 1606 onward. In 1614, he took part in the capture of Wesel, and he died in 1622 in Brussels.

33.3.5 The defence of 's Hertogenbosch in 1603

's Hertogenbosch, also known as Den Bosch and Balduque, has frequently been the scene of violence during the Eighty Years War because of its strategic location. In 1603, Enric Desclergue (DC05c) protected the city from a Siege by Mauritz van Nassau.

The Siege began on July 24, 1603, and lasted until September 9. It was Enric's first military activity and was a success. Later, the town would finally go to the Dutch in 1629.

33.3.6 His involvements in Ostend and Sluis

Sluis, also known as la Esclusa or Enclusa, had been secured by the Spanish after they besieged the town in 1587 by the forces of Alexander Farnese. The city was significant because, together with Damme, it protected access to Bruges.

In, 1604, during the struggle for Ostend, the Dutch successfully besieged Sluis. Today, it's still Dutch. Mauritz van Nassau, along with Horace Vere, was in charge of the Dutch armed forces, while the troops of Luis de Velasco and Mateo Serrano defended the town.

The assault on Sluis began on April 25, 1604, when the 11000-strong Dutch armies left Vlissingen to the isle of Cadzand, shown in Figures 33.18, 33.16 and 33.15. They conquered the island but could not cross the wetlands and the river of Het Zwin, which was required to reach Ostend, their ultimate goal. Instead, they made a turn and went to Sluis.

On their way, they took the Oostburg line, Ijzendijke, and on May 12, Aardenburg. In 1604, taking Sluis was necessary for the Dutch because the Spanish navy was located in the town to hinder the passage of Dutch vessels from Vlissingen to Ostend. The battle between the Spanish, led by Luis de Velasco and including Enric Desclergue (DC05c), and the Dutch took place at Moerkerke while the Dutch were trying to circumvent Sluis.

After a Siege of 2 months, the Spanish attempted to free Sluis, led by Ambrogio Spinola. They could cross the Dutch lines at Sint Kruis, took the Oostburg line, and encountered heavy Dutch resistance at Coxysche Gat and Zwarte Gat. This unsuccessful attempt to liberate Sluis led to a capitulation of the town on August 14, 1604. The Dutch were now totally in charge of the isle of Cadzand and considered it as compensation for their ongoing loss of Ostend. The Spanish would take the latter, including the three Desclergue brothers, on September 22, 1604. The episode is extensively described in Chapter 29.5.28.

Enric Desclergue almost died in the blast that cost Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) life at Ostend, as he was 'badly injured in the head, and with the guts out of his belly, appearing as if he was at the end of his life.'

Once recovered, however, he continued serving as a soldier in several companies until the 20th of 1605, when he was promoted to captain. Like his brother Antoni Desclergue (I) (DC05 b), he was offered the command of a company in the Tercio of Alonso de Luna and later in the Tercio of Simón Antúnez.

Under Louis de Comboursier, also known as Du Terrail, the Spanish launched an attack on Sluis on July 12, 1606, but this would be unsuccessful.

33.3.7 The battles with Ambrogio Spinola 1606-1609

In the Siege of Rhinberg he was again hurt, in 1606, from a picaço in an arm and a mosquetaço in the head ('de donde el tal Enrique salió mal herido de un picago en un brago, i un mosquetaço en la cabeça, la qual le trapenaron [sic], y estuvo al extremo de su vida'), but he moved on. He continued as captain in Flanders until the truce of twelve years, from 1609. Enric was delighted by the surgery, so he did not give up and continued his career as a captain.[5]

Ambrogio Spinola was born in Genua in 1569. He was an Italian citizen of the Spanish Empire renowned for his strategic qualities as a military. He was sent to the Netherlands to support the Cardinal Archduke Albert in his wars with the Dutch, partially because they had captured Nieuwpoort in 1600.

Ambrogio Spinola had arrived in 1606 in Flanders from Milan with a vast army. He attacked the Dutch from the east to face the equally intelligent Prince Mauritz of Nassau.

33.3.7.1 The Battle of the Berkumerbrug in Zwolle

Berkum is a place just outside Zwolle, in Figure 33.21, at 3km from the old town, and can be reached from Zwolle via Walstraat, Spoelstraat and Almelose Kanaal along the Nieuwe Vecht waterway (Philosofenallee and Vondelkade) up to Tussen de Verlaten, where Berkum is located. Spinola's primordial goal was Zwolle. He knew it would be impossible to take the city. Still, he tried to weaken it by cutting off one of its significant accesses while forcing the Dutch to maintain a large army in the North and undermine their Southern flanks. A partial success, for instance, by controlling the Zwarte Water River through the occupation of the fortresses of Kijk, Vegt, and Genemuiden, would have cut the Dutch territory in two in the North and weakened them significantly.

Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c), brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), was in this army and was 4 km from the center of Zwolle on August 1-2, 1606. Even if the Spanish had not captured Zwolle immediately, a successful raid on the mentioned fortresses would have weakened Zwolle, Groningen, and Drenthe. It could allow the Spanish to take control over the entire North province of Friesland.

The Spanish, who had tried to cross the Zwarte Water River after an approach along the rivers Regge and Overijsselse Vecht, were halted by a Dutch garrison from Zwolle. As they say, 'Sometimes you win, sometimes you lose.' That early August, no fathers have been murdered at Zwolle.

The Dutch had carefully studied the Spanish approach and fortified Zutphen and Deventer. Spinola played the game and sent soldiers to Holten to give the impression that he wanted to capture Deventer to mislead Mauritz of Nassau.

In the days before the attack on the Berkumerbrug, Mauritz pulled back some garrisons from Lochem and, therefore, made this place weaker. Spinola would exploit this weakness, as described in the next section, Chapter 33.3.7.2.

Even during the last days of July, Spinola attempted to mislead the Dutch by sending troops to Bronkhorst and Doesburg.

When the Spanish approached Zwolle from the North, their movements were immediately noticed, and the city's garrison was promptly warned. The two armies clashed at the Zwartewatersdijk on August 1, and the battle continued the following day, just outside of Zwolle. It remains uncertain if any Spanish forces managed to cross the water on the Mastenbroek plane. However, the Dutch, with their resilience and strategic foresight, drove the Spanish back to the Berkumerbrug in the East, effectively safeguarding Zwolle.

Interestingly, it was the Belgian Simon Stevin from Bruges, who took the Dutch side, that had warned the Dutch about the need to fortify Zwolle sufficiently. After the Spanish attack, the Dutch finally heeded Stevin's advice and fortified the town. This fortification proved effective, as Zwolle was never again attacked by the Spanish. This historical episode highlights the international cooperation and shared military knowledge that was instrumental in shaping the Dutch defense. It is, therefore, fascinating to realize that the strength of the Dutch, still evident in Zwolle, is, in fact, Belgian.

33.3.7.2 The two Sieges of Lochem

In the final days of July 1606, while Spinola and Nassau were engaged in a chess game near Zwolle, the town of Lochem had been weakened by Nassau on July 21 (see Figures 33.22, 33.23, and 33.24). Spinola's forces, including Enric Desclergue (DC05c), quickly besieged the town. The Spanish military negotiated with the inhabitants of Lochem, referred to as Locomo by the Spanish and promised them religious freedom. This led to a swift surrender.

Following the surrender, a minimal Spanish force under the command of Diaz remained in Lochem, while the rest of the troops proceeded towards Zwolle, as described in the previous section. Lochem, a symbol of Dutch resilience, stayed under Spanish control until the end of October, when Nassau used brute force to compel the Spaniards to surrender. Diaz, along with approximately 400 soldiers, was allowed to leave and they retreated to Rheinberg. From November onward, Lochem, a testament to the Dutch spirit, was back under Dutch control.

33.3.7.3 The two Sieges of Groenlo

Groenlo, or Grol, in Figure 33.25, which the Dutch had captured in 1597, was besieged by the Spanish from August 3 until August 14, 1606. Enric Desclergue (DC05c) was one of the besiegers.

Despite an attempt by the Dutch to take the town back on November 9, it remained Spanish until 1627. The Dutch Siege of Groenlo on November 9 had been unsuccessful due to an intervention by the Spanish forces, including Enric Desclergue (DC05c), led by Ambrogio Spinola.

33.3.7.4 The Siege of Rheinberg

Rheinberg, in Figure 33.26, is also known as Rijnberk and Rinberg. From August 22 until October 1, 1606, the Siege took place and was won by the Spanish. Enric Desclergue (DC05c) participated in the Siege.

The Siege of Rheinberg, or Rijnberk, took place from August 22 until October 1, 1606, and was won by the Spanish. Count de Bucquoy led the Spanish on behalf of Ambrogio Spinola, while Mauritz of Nassau and Frederik Hendrik led the Dutch. Note that, in Chapter 34, concerning Antoni Desclergue (DCo6), the son of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), there are several links described with the family Bucquoy.

To besiege Rheinberg, the Spanish had blocked the river with a ship south of the city and placed cannons to defend the blockage. The purpose was to prevent provisions to the town. While de Bucquoy besieged the municipality, Spinola moved his army to Wesel, in Figures 33.28 and 33.30, and crossed the Rhine River to join the troops of Bucquoy. He was followed by the soldiers of Nassau, who were unsuccessful in stopping Spinola and decided to camp at Wesel to disturb the Siege from there as much as possible. With brute force, Spinola attacked the outer defenses of Rheinberg and forced the Dutch in these positions to surrender.

Meanwhile, with his troops, Íñigo de Borja y Velasco stayed on the Wesel side to prevent Nassau's support while Spinola attacked Rheinberg from the opposite side. While the Spanish encircled Rheinberg, they dug numerous approaches to get closer to the city, while the Dutch dug sortie trenches to counter-attack the Spanish. Because the situation was helpless for the Dutch, Nassau decided to play poker in an ultimate attempt to provide support. He moved his army of 15000 militaries to Alphen while transferring 2000 of them to Meurs. He gave Spinola the impression that the Dutch army dug in at Alphen. However, he immediately sent all his soldiers to the forces of Íñigo de Borja y Velasco at Rheinberg for a relentless attack.

The plan was to simultaneously let the Dutch in Rheinberg attack and storm the same camp inside the city. Íñigo de Borja y Velasco had a powerful army prepared for the battle after understanding the Dutch plan. His immense strength made the Dutch decide to end their dreams because they feared that had they lost the battle, they would have been too weak to withstand further expansions by the Spanish into the Netherlands. For this reason, the Dutch gave up Rheinberg, but the inhabitants maintained their resistance until October 1, 1606. When the people of Rheinberg surrendered, they obtained good conditions from the Spanish.

Charles Bonaventure de Longueval, the count of Bucquoy, in Figure 33.27, was born in Arras in 1571 and died in Neuhausel in 1621. He had a high position in the Spanish army and was already active in the military at 13. In 1600, he took part in the battle of Nieuwpoort, which the Spanish lost, but later, he also contributed to successes such as Ostend in 1604 and, as described here, in Rheinberg 1606.

33.3.8 His Mediterranean Career in the Period 1610-1613

Santiago Alberti, in his paper 'Esquema Històric del llinatge Pedrolo,' mentions,

No hem pogut aclarir una sospita que l'home va fer unes escapades bèl·liques a la costa algeriana,' which translates as 'We have not been able to clarify a suspicion that he was involved in war activities on the Algerian coast.'

This intriguing statement suggests potential military activities in the Mediterranean involving Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés. Notably, his connection to Carlos Coloma may provide further insights.

Carlos Coloma played a pivotal role in the military career of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), as well as his relatives Antoni (DC05b) and Enric (DC05c). The trio participated in the Siege of Ostend, where Jeroni (DC05d) was killed in 1604. To comprehend the subsequent events involving Enric (DC05c) and Antoni (DC05b), it is essential to revisit Coloma's influence. Coloma transitioned from Flanders to a significant career in the Mediterranean before returning to Flanders. Miguel Ángel Guill Ortega's book, "Carlos Coloma," elucidates Coloma's life, drawing from various historical sources, including Coloma's writings about his time in Flanders. The intriguing aspect is that Coloma's children were named Jeroni, Antoni, and Francesc—names that resonate with the Desclergue family. Furthermore, the Coloma family had ties with Toledo and Mallorca, adding a personal touch. The Pax Hispania, established on April 9, 1609, marked Spain's recognition of the Dutch provinces and Belgium as separate territories from the Netherlands, France, and Germany. This truce arguably signifies Belgium's birth as a distinct entity, 221 years before its formal independence.

Despite the ceasefire bringing peace to Flanders, Spain faced ongoing threats from the Turkish Empire and internal issues with the Moriscos.

Carlos Coloma, among others, was responsible for transporting Moriscos from Spain, primarily Valencia, to North Africa. It is plausible that during such operations, Enric Desclergue (I) was involved, aligning with Alberti's suggestion of Desclergue's activities on the Algerian coast. After his death, Enric's widow contacted his brother Francesc Desclergue (DC05e) in Montblanc, hinting at possible encounters in Catalonia post-1609. During this period, nearly 4000 people were expelled from Catalonia.

Coloma served as governor in Perpignan (then part of Catalonia) for 11 years after 1610, receiving further promotions. His gratitude led him to commission an altarpiece from Rubens, dedicated to Saint Joseph. In 1611, Coloma became Viceroy of Mallorca, an island in the Balearics between mainland Catalonia and Algeria.

Enric Desclergue (DC05c) likely participated in operations in Algeria under Coloma's command, as being Viceroy also entailed the role of Captain-General of the Spanish army in the region. This period, rather than the Morisco deportation, may be what Alberti references regarding Desclergue's involvement in Algerian warfare. Besides Turkish attacks, Mallorca frequently faced Berber assaults. Coloma remained Viceroy until 1617, continuing a family tradition; his father, Juan Coloma, had been Viceroy of Sardinia (1570-1577). Known for his proactive governance, Coloma likely found the autonomous Viceroyalty fitting. His Flemish wife, Margarita de Liedekerke, and their six children accompanied him in Mallorca.

In Chapter 34 on Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), particularly Chapters 34.5.16 and 49, we explore his chapel construction in Deerlijk, Belgium. The chapel's statue resembles Santa Maria del Pi, possibly linked to Coloma's emotional connection with Santa Maria del Pi (Barcelona) and Antoni's desire to honor this Maria in 1639. When Coloma was Viceroy of Mallorca, Porto Pi's tip (portum de nomine pini in Latin, or the harbor of the pines) was fortified to protect Palma de Mallorca's crucial harbor. Today, it is known as the port of San Carlos, in Coloma's honor.

Coloma's involvement extended to Malta, as detailed in Miguel Ángel Guill Ortega's "Carlos Coloma." After his tenure in Malta, Coloma returned to Flanders in 1617, becoming governor of Cambrai. During this period, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Jeroni's son, was recruited. From then on, traces of Antoni (II) (DC05b) and Enric (DC05c) reappear in Flanders.

Enric (DC05c) received his accolade in 1623 and is noted on a church certificate in Wingene, dating to 1631, the year of his death. Upon Coloma's return to Flanders, Antoni (DC05b), Jeroni's and Enric's brother, resurfaced in Wingene. Coloma served as Governor of Cambrai from 1617 until 1632, although he did not reside there permanently.

33.3.9 His Involvement in Eastern Provinces and Residence of Enric Desclergue in Antwerp with his Brother Antoni, and the Onset of the 30-year War, 1614-1618

33.3.9.1 Residence in Antwerp

It is essential to remember that Íñigo de Borja y Velasco served as the governor of the Antwerp citadel from 1606 until he died in 1622. Consequently, it is not coincidental that Enric Desclergue (DC05c) and his brother Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) also used Antwerp as their base during this period.

The evidence of their residency in Antwerp from 1617 to 1618 (see Chapter 32) reveals a personal and familial decision. It is highly likely that Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) and his brother Enric (DC05c), along with their families, relocated to Antwerp to reside in the Spanish-held castle as tensions began to rise again in Europe. This was a time of great anxiety, a consequence of the Peace of Augsburg, which allowed rulers to determine the religion of their subjects. As a result, some regions became Lutheran, while others remained Catholic.

Various political and geographical unification occurred to strengthen their position against Islamic forces, leading to significant tension. The situation deteriorated further when Archduke Ferdinand fought with the Lutherans in Austria around 1609. By 1617, Ferdinand sought to revoke the religious freedoms of the Hussites in Bohemia, ultimately leading to the Thirty Years' War outbreak in May 1618.

33.3.9.2 Support for Aachen

Aachen, in Figure 33.29, is Aquisgrán in Spanish. In 1609-1614, there was a succession war of Gulik-Kleef, known in Germany as the Jülich-Klevischer Erbfolgestreit and in Spanish La crisis de Juliers-Cléveris.

It was a conflict in which the different European powers wanted to show their strength by demanding a solution according to their terms and showing off their military potential. Because no country wanted to reduce its influence, the conflict was costly for everyone involved. The Spanish initially stayed out of the War, hoping for a peaceful solution in their favor and trying to continue their treaty with the Dutch.

However, the tide turned when some crucial people in Aachen reconverted to Catholicism in 1614, in a town where the Calvinists had taken power in May 1612. The Spanish were then obliged to support Aachen as a member of their Catholic League. The Spanish prepared around 20000 soldiers, including Enric Desclergue (DC05c), to help Aachen, which frightened the powers involved in the Gulik-Kleef dispute and forced them to bolster their positions under control in case the whole region would destabilize. We can mention a famous quote of Ambrogio Spinola to his army in Maastricht in 1614,

'Before we think of the Affairs of Juliers, the vicinity of Aachen ought to engage us to make on that side the first efforts of our army to punish the heretics of that city and to execute the Imperial Mandate discerned against them, of which the Archduke and the Elector of Cologne are Bearers. Everyone knows with what boldness and contempt for the Imperial Mandates the heretic citizens have dared usurp the government of Aachen, which belonged formerly to the Catholics only. Thus, an infinity of reasons obliges us to repress by force so unjust a usurpation.'[6]

The Spanish attacked Aachen from Maastricht. Luis de Velasco and his cavalry opened the way, followed by Germans, Burgundians, Walloons, and many more Spanish military. The Spanish also blocked the road from Aachen to Jülich to prevent help from there by the Dutch. After arriving in Aachen and a few gunshots, the Spanish commenced negotiating with the inhabitants to surrender. The city turned Spanish again before the Dutch hand could send relief. The defenders of Aachen were allowed to leave in honor and were replaced by Catholic Germans.

The Spanish took Wesel ('Vesel') after they had captured Aachen. It was one of the towns under dispute in the succession war of Gulik-Kleef, and the Spanish found it convenient to set foot on the town and make it part of their circle of influence. Enric Desclergue (DC05c) was one of the militaries in this campaign. The city turned Spanish and would remain Spanish until 1629 when the Dutch Otto van Gendt took it back from the Spanish commander at Wesel, Francisco Lozano.

33.3.9.3 The capture of Wesel

The capture of Wesel by Spinola in 1614 is shown in Figure 33.30.

33.3.9.4 The Kleef-Rees-Jülich issue

When the Spanish increased the pressure on the Jülich-Cleve area, shown in Figures 33.28 and 33.31, Enric Desclergue (DC05c) was stationed at Rees, ready for action should that have been necessary and to protect Jülich, which was under a siege by the French and the Dutch. The Spanish finally gave away Jülich when the Dutch mined the city walls and blasted a significant fortification section.

33.3.10 Enric Desclergue was Awarded in 1623

Enric Desclergue (DC05) received an award for his extraordinary services from Simon Antuñez in 1623. Simon Antuñez is also described in Figure 29.7 on page 370 and resided at Tournai, like Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The documentation is shown at the beginning of this chapter.

33.3.11 His Residence in Wingene

The settlement of Enric in Wingene is not unexpected. Following the Dutch Republic's capture of Sluis and the subsequent blockade of the Westerschelde, access to the port of Antwerp was effectively cut off. In response, the Spanish regime sought alternative routes and decided to construct a canal linking Ghent to Bruges, officially inaugurated in 1621. Consequently, Beernem-Wingene was designated as a strategic defense area against the Dutch Republic. This region became populated with military personnel, including active and retired members of the Spanish army.

33.4 His Spouses

33.4.1 Maria, the First Wife of Enric Desclergue

Maria, shown in Figure 33.33, was the first wife of Enric Desclergue.

33.4.2 Ana Fabiana Pacheco, the Second Wife of Enric Desclergue

In Flanders, Enric (DC05c) married Ana Pacheco, a Spanish. He became the father of one boy.[7] He died after 1623, which is in agreement with what we found about him in Flanders. His wife Anna Pacheco, whom he had married while in Flanders, apparently wrote a letter to her brother-in-law Francesc Desclergue (DC05e) after this death.

Alberti declares in his paper 'Esquema Històric del llinatge Pedrolo' that,

'Enric married in Flanders to a certain Fabiana ('Ana') Pacheco. At some point, his widow writes a letter to Francesc Desclergue in Montblanc, not long after Enric was awarded for his military achievements. The letter says that Enric has died as an elderly and that he had one child.'

Assuming that Alberti's statement is accurate, we should find Ana (Fabiana) Pacheco in the Belgian archives. We have not been able to retrieve her with absolute certainty; however, we discovered an Anna Pasque and Anna Pascua in the first half of the 17th century in Eernegem and Leisele. Certainly, Eernegem is not far from Wingene. We do not claim that it is the same Ana Pacheco. However, the Pacheco family was probably present in West Flanders then, and Ana Pacheco may have been a member of that Spanish family. Members of this family were perhaps in Flanders long before the Desclergue as we have found a person Diego Lopez de Pacheco, Duque of Escalona (1456 - 1529), who became a member of the Order of the Golden Fleece in 1519[8]. There is also Marco Pacheco, a soldier at the Spanish Castle in Gent, who married Barbara de Mor at Gent in 1646. We also found the wedding of Anthonia Pacheco and a soldier, Gabriel Moreno, at the exact location. In the 1660s and later, we find births of Pachecos at Veurne, Bruges, and Brussels.

Although we found no solid proof of a link between the two families, in Chapter 19.15.3, we describe the partner of Bertrand du Guesclin and how the couple established a de Torró lineage. In that context, interesting work was published by Andrés Nicás Moreno[9] which may provide a clue.

In 1557, Don Juan Pacheco passed away. He was the son of Alonso Pacheco and Marina Fernández de Torres and the Comandador de Lopera. Alonso Pacheco, who passed away in 1490, was descended from Fernán Jeremías II, Seor de Ferreira de Aves, through Diego Lopez Pacheco, 9th Seor de Ferreira de Aves, Bellas y Celorica in Portugal and 1st Seor de Béjar in Castile. The lineage was matrilineal. Indeed, Alonso Pacheco's father, Jean Pacheco, 3rd Señor de Belmonte, 1st Marqués de Villena, 1st Conde de Xiquena y de los Vélez, and Duque de Escalona, was the son of María Pacheco, II Señora de Belmonte and Alfonso Téllez-Girón, 1st Señor de Almansa. Marina Fernández de Torres, the illegitimate wife of Alonso Pacheco, died in Lopera in 1547.[10] Her father was Juan Alonso de Torres, and she likely descended from a noble Lopera de Torres clan.

Diego López Pacheco is Juan Pacheco's progenitor. Diego López Pacheco married Juana Vázquez Pereyra, and their son, Juan Fernández Pacheco, was the 10th Lord of Ferreira de Aves, Penela, Celorico and Oliveira and the Guard Mayor of King Mr. Juan I of Portugal.

Juan Fernández Pacheco participated in the Battle of Aljubarrota in 1384, after which he entered the service of King Enrique III of Castile. This resulted in confiscation of all of his assets in Portugal, for which the monarch of Castile granted him the Villa de Belmonte, of which he was the First Lord.

Juan Fernández Pacheco wed in Portugal Doa Inés Téllez de Meneses, whose lone daughter and heiress Doa Mara Pacheco, 2nd Lady of Belmonte, married her cousin Don Alonso Téllez-Girón. However, according to the marriage contracts, the eldest son of this union chose Pacheco as his first surname and not Téllez-Girón, thereby uniting the two famous houses of Girón and Pacheco.

Don Alonso Téllez-Girón went to Castile with his father when he was a small boy, where he became wealthy during the reign of Juan II and after Enrique IV. In 1431, he served alongside the first sovereign in the destruction of Vega de Granada and against the infantes of Aragon. In 1445, as a reward for his services, King Juan II bestowed upon him the Villa de Almansa, but he did not assume possession of it, so he must have perished around this time.

Don Juan Pacheco was the firstborn child of this couple. In 1419, this gentleman was born in Belmonte. As his maternal grandfather's successor in the United States, he inherited the Pacheco family name and arms with the obligation to pass them down to his descendants. Juan II created him the 3rd Lord of Belmonte and the 1st Marqués de Villena in 1445. He was also the first Count of Xiquena and de los Velez, founded in 1460, and the first Duke of Escalona, created by King Enrique IV of Spain in 1472. He was the XXXIX Grand Master of the Order of Santiago and the Administrator of the Mastership of Calatrava, the Marshal and Mayor of Castilla, the Perpetual Warden of the Villa de Molina, the Mayor of Seville, Soria, and Logroo, and a Knight of the Order of 'Jarra de Aragon y Valido' of Henry IV.

If Ana Fabiana Pacheco was a member of this lineage, her relationship with Enric Desclergue (DC05c) must have been strategic and natural.

Other Pacheco links are outlined in Chapter 19.15.3 on page 188 and Chapter 27.2 on page 301.

33.5 The Death of Enric Desclergue

The document in Figure 33.34 shows that in 1617 when Francesc Desclergue wrote his testament, only his brother Enric was still alive, while Antoni and Jeroni had died. Enric Desclergue ('Henricus Le Clerge') died at Wingene in 1631. His death certificate is shown in Figure 33.35.

33.6 His Offspring

We found the baptism of Gertrude, possibly the daughter of Enric Desclergue and Ana Pacheco, although we read 'Fabio.' The certificate, shown in Figure 33.36, mentions that they were married and the godmother was possibly a daughter of 'de Fuentes' (Paul-Bernard de Fontaines, 1566 Lorraine - May 19, 1643, Rocroi) from the Spanish armed forces. The baptism took place in Brussels at the Saint Jacob church at the 'Hof van Brussel,' also known as the Palace of Koudenberg, in Figure 33.38, the center of the administration and rule of Belgium.

After Enric's death, Ana Fabiana Pacheco remarried Juan Llorein, shown in Figure 33.39. At Eernegem, in 1642, we found the baptism of a girl named Juana Lloren ('Joanna Lorrein'), daughter of Juan Lloren ('Joannes Lorrein') and Ana Fabiana Pacheco ('Anna Pasgue'), shown in Figure 33.39. The godfather was Jean d'Orchimont, and the godmother was Maria de Montoya ('Mattoye'). Given the names, we suspect that the people involved were Wallon and Spanish troops.

Note that Jeroni Desclergue's (DC05) wife was Felipa de Montoya. Felipa had a brother, Jeronimo de Montoya, who died in Ostend in 1604, like Felipa's husband, Jeroni Desclergue (DC06). Jeronimo de Montoya had three children, Jerome, Maria, and Antonio (born in Harelbeke in 1598). Maria de Montoya, who served as godmother to Juana Lloren, was Felipa de Montoya's niece, Enric Desclergue's (DC05c) sister-in-law.

Concerning the child's name, she may have been named after Maria de Montoya's auntie Juana de Montoya (born at Torre, Burgos, Spain, in 1561). Indeed, Felipa de Montoya had the following siblings: Juana de Montoya (1561), Maria de Montoya (1559), and Jeronimo (+1604).

If this is Ana Pacheco, it could mean that she remarried and lived at Eernegem, possibly having her child of Enric Desclergue with her.

Chapter 34

Antoni Desclergue y de Montoya (DC06), the son of Jeroni

34.1 Introduction

Don Antoni Desclergue y de Montoya (DC06), our paternal ancestor, was born in Barcelona and baptized in Belgium. He was the son of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya. Following his father's death, his mother remarried a local man, enabling Spanish-Catalan Antoni to integrate into regional communities.

Antoni Desclergue y de Montoya (DC06) embarked on a distinguished military career after being recruited by Carlos Coloma de Saa, a friend of his late father. In recognition of his achievements, Antoni constructed a chapel in Deerlijk in 1639, with financial support from a local banker, as detailed in Chapter 49.

Antoni lived to a considerable age.

34.2 The Discovery of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) by Jose Sanchez Real

As mentioned in the acknowledgments at the beginning of this book, Jose Sanchez Real was a gifted historian with an academic background in chemistry. He was the first person to study the Desclergue family. His book, 'La Casa Desclergue de Montblanc' , was published in 1974 by Caja de Ahorros Provincial, Tarragona.[1] and printed in Barcelona[2]

Sanchez Real fulfilled his study in the framework of restoring the house of Desclergue on the main square of Montblanc. However, a combination of limited time and a focus on the house and the people who constructed or renovated it prevented him from exploring the family's history beyond the records he had access to in such a limited amount of time.

Still, he was the first to find Antoni Desclergue (DC06), but he needed more information to place him on the family's ancestry. Similarly, he did not discover the three brothers who went to Flanders, namely Jeroni (DC05), Antoni (DC05b), and Enric (DC05c). Their discovery was made by later investigators, as described in Chapter 29, Chapter 32, and Chapter 33. Interestingly, in his book, Sanchez Real mentions Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) admittedly, though somewhat covered. He knew he should not discard this person from the book because of the information, but he did not know where to assign him. He knew that Antoni (DC06) was linked to Montblanc and Barcelona and that he must be placed in the realm of (his father) Jeroni (DC05). Still, because Jeroni's (DC05) existence was not apparent at the time of Sanchez Real's research, he somehow made the mistake of attaching Antoni (DC06) to Geronimo Desclergue of 1503, a Barcelonese knight, stemming from our common ancestors described in Part VI, married, 140 years earlier than Antoni's appearance in the literature.

In the light of the research done after 1974, for instance, by Salvador J. Rovira i Gómez, we know that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was born in Barcelona during his parents' residence in the city, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa de Montoya, but he was raised in Belgium.

He played an essential role in the Spanish army of Flanders and was referred to in the literature as Catalan because of his birthplace and his ancestors' town of Montblanc.

To allow the reader to comprehend how Jose Sanchez Real had placed Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in his book in 1974, we offer a Figure 34.1: The signature of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), 'Caballero de Felipe.' Antoni Desclergue, indicating a 'C' before his name, with an F and A merged oddly, clearly separating the F from the rest of the anagramic character, and EHR in the middle, meaning Knight of the Spanish King, or, 'Eques Hispani Rex.' If the middle is only an ornament instead of H, there is ER, meaning 'Eques Regii,' or Royal Knight. The anagram is highlighted in Figure 34.2. An anagram, however, can be read at a deeper level as if it is an artistic representation of characters, not necessarily to be read from left to right, etc. Jairo Eduardo Cortés Rosal analyzed the anagram and concluded that it represents 'JDCM' and, therefore, is a reference to the two bloodlines Antoni's Desclergue branch stemmed from, being that of Joan Desclergue and that of Cortés de Monroy. The signature can be found when Antoni's wife Beatrice died in 1651, shown in Chapter 34.12.3 on page 587. Adding an indication of one's Spanish Knighthood was not unique and can also be found in Figure 34.155 on page 576 of another Spanish Knight in Tournai.

Consta de un mandato expedido en 19 de julio de dicho año en la Curia de Cervera, en las escrituras de Matheo Magre, en donde se lee que esta familia de Desclergas eran Cavalleros Donzeles. In English, this implies, 'Desclergas. This family was domiciled in Barcelona, where the male line had ended; the memories that I find are that in the year 1503, Geronimo Desclergas was Veguer de Cervera (Vigerius of Cervera, or Lord of Cervera) by the King of Spain and Archduke of Austria Don Felipe l. It consists of a mandate issued on July 19 of that year in the Curia of Cervera, in the writings of Matheo Magre, where it is read that this family of Desclergas were Cavalleros Donzeles (i.e. Knights). Don Antonio Desclergas (II) (DC06) served Philip 4 of Spain for 22 years in Flanders while unanimously valued by the generals for his exceptional value, on page 241 of the representation that the city of Barcelona made to said King Philip IV in the year 1640.'
Jose Sanchez Real ignores the whole family of Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04) except one son, Francesc Desclergue (DC05e), on page 31 of his book. It stems from the fact that he is the only son who has been responsible for the early conservation of the Casa Desclergue in Montblanc and because he formed, through his daughter Isabella Desclergue (DC05ex1), the continuation of the family towards the Jori and the Pedrolo families.
Salvador J. Rovira i Gómez[3] found more members of the family of Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04), namely on pages 83-84, Francesca Desclergue (DC05d), Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), Antoni Desclergue (I) (DC05b), Enric Desclergue (DC05c) and Francesc Desclergue (DC05e).

34.3 Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) in the Literature

In Pere Costa,[4] we find the text that Sanchez Real also referred to,
'Don Antonio Desclergas sirvió a Felipe 4 de España 22 años en Flandes con singular estimación de los generales por su bizarro valor, léese en la página 241 de la representación que la ciudad de Barcelona hizo a dicho Rey Felipe 4 el año 1640.,' or translated into English,
'Don Antonio Desclergas (DC06) served Philip IV of Spain 22 years in Flanders while unanimously valued by the generals for his exceptional value, on page 241 of the representation that the city of Barcelona made to said H.M. King Philip IV in the year 1640.'
Note that H.M. King Felipe IV reigned from 1621 onwards. It is, therefore, mathematically impossible that Antoni could have served him for 22 years by the year 1640. Thus Antoni became a military at the end of the reign of H.M. King Felipe III and served the Kings for 22 years.
Antoni Desclergue (DC06) appeared in the famous work 'Plainte Catholique des Catalans' [5] in 1641, shown in Figures 34.5, 34.6, 34.7 and 34.8.
In particular, in section XXXIV, on page 129, it is stated, that Don Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) tells that a number of Catalan nobles, including himself, have served a great part of their lives in the wars in Flanders and have never been rewarded for it..
The same can be found on page 109 in the Dutch version of this book, 'Catholijcke Klachte' [6], shown in Figures 34.3 and 34.4.

On page 123, in section 'XXXIIII: La nobleza Catalana sin estimacion' of the original Castilian version[7], shown in 34.9, 34.10 and 34.11, we found, for instance,

'. . . Don Antoni Desclergue (DC09b), y otros, que emplearō lo florido de sus años en la guerra (de machos destos refiere grades hazañas do Carlos Coloma en sus guerras de Flandes) có valor estrenuo, no ascançaró ningú fruto. . . .'

On page 129 of the French version, we read a paragraph expressing Antoni Desclergue's (II) (DC06) character,

'Ce que l' on pratique aujourd' hui en Catalogne plus ordinairement, est de repartir les charges de la Principauté, & donner des avancements à personnes d' autres Provinces contre les constitutions de Catalogne, ou à ceux qui appuyez sur les grands, s' avancent par secrètes intelligences, ou aux parents, & adhérents des Ministres d' Etat, encore qu' ils n' aient pas la qualité de Soldats. Ce qui donne occasion au Chevalier Don Antonio Desclergue (DC06) Catalan, étant dépité de ces disproportions, & ennuyé de solliciter en Cour récompensé de ses services, de demander un Evêchés, disant, qu' il était aussi propre pour être Évêque, encore qu' il n' eût étudié, que les autres, pour être Capitaines, n' ayans jamais été Soldats.'

In English, this translates to

'Currently in Catalonia, it is a common practice to appoint individuals to official positions within the Principality, often disregarding the traditional constitutions of Catalonia. Advancements are frequently granted to individuals from other provinces, or to those who support influential figures, gain favor through clandestine means, or are relatives and associates of the Ministers of State, irrespective of their qualifications, including military experience.

This practice has prompted the Catalan Knight, Don Antonio Desclergue, to express his discontent. Frustrated by these disparities and the need to petition at court for recognition of his services, he has ironically requested a bishopric. Desclergue argues that he is as qualified to be a bishop, despite lacking theological education, as others are to be captains, despite never having served as soldiers (DC06).'

The Desclergues family, known for invoking freedom of speech even in the presence of high-ranking nobles, attributes this trait to their ancient and distinguished lineage. Their nobility, often referred to as "purple blood," surpasses that of many other noble families in antiquity. Historical records indicate that the Desclergues were established as nobles during Roman times. Another example where a Desclergue permits himself to complain is shown in Chapter 18.11.1.

34.4 The Birth of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06)

Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), whose lineage is illustrated in Figure 34.12, was the eldest son and heir of Don Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and Felipa De Montoya. His siblings included Jeroni Desclergue (DC06d, a priest), Juana (DC06c, born in Ghent in 1588 and died in Ghent in 1622), and Anna (DC06f, born in Kortrijk in 1595 and died in Ostend in 1627). Notably, after the death of their father Jeroni in 1605, his brother Miguel (DC06b) was born.

Antoni was born in Barcelona and baptized in Tournai on June 26, 1602. His father, Jeroni (DC05), had been commissioned to recruit soldiers for the Army of Flanders. He received this official order during an audience with the Viceroy of Catalonia on June

This family movement may be allegorically represented in the 'Flight from Egypt' panel, depicted in Figure 49.76 on page 1014 and described in Chapter 49.4.3.4. This panel, brought by Antoni Desclergue (DC06) from Spain to Flanders, symbolically reflects their migration.

Meanwhile, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) actively recruited soldiers in towns near Montblanc. The recruited soldiers were scheduled to depart from Barcelona for Flanders on December 12, 1602.

The episode is described in Chapter 29.5.26.

Antoni, born in Barcelona but baptized in Tournai, lived with dual national identities. During this period, it was not uncommon for baptisms to be delayed by several weeks after birth without issue.

His father, Jeroni, was born in Montblanc and enlisted in the Spanish army in 1587. He was promptly dispatched to Flanders, where he played an active role in various military campaigns, including those in Holland, Cambrai, Amiens, and Ostend, where he ultimately died in 1604. Between 1598 and 1601, Jeroni returned to Barcelona to attend the Corts of 1599.

Regarding Antoni (DC06), additional information clarifies his age. When his mother, Felipa De Montoya, passed away in 1628, Antoni was already an adult, as the Orphan's deed was only registered for his younger brother Miguel (DC06b). It confirms that Antoni (DC06) was born before 1603.

In a book from 1641, referenced in Chapter 34.3, it is noted that Antoni had served in the army in Flanders for 22 years, indicating that 1640 or 1641 marked his 22nd year of service. Given that the minimum age for military service was 18, this suggests Antoni joined the military no earlier than age 17. Therefore, it is plausible that Antoni (DC06) was born in the spring of 1602 in Barcelona. His baptism, recorded in Figure 34.13, took place in Tournai at the Church of Marie-Magdalena, documented on page 50 of the church book, on June 26, 1602.

Perhaps interesting to mention here is that Pierre Minuit (Peter Minnewit), who was the governor of Nova Belgica (Nieuw Nederland) from 1626 until 1631, nowadays known as New York, was the one who had purchased Manhattan from the Lenape Native Americans (Canarsie). He also founded the Swedish colony of New Sweden on the Delaware Peninsula in 1638. He was born in Wesel in 1594, eight years before Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06). His father, Jean Minuit, who married Sara Brel, originated from Tournai and had fled with his family because he was a Protestant.

It is plausible that Antoni was named after the Sint Antonius fortress of Ostend, located northeast of the town, across from the

Maria Ana Cortés de Monroy y Vega Bazán
She appears one time as Catharina Desclergue in a document in 1576 (Montblanc) in which it would have been harmful to reveal her true identity being a Cortés. The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortés.

The actions undertaken from the Sint Antonius fortress were crucial for the partial success of this assault. This strategic location allowed for the bombardment of the city and enabled the destruction of vessels delivering supplies to the Dutch and English forces stationed in the town. Maps indicating these locations can be found in Chapter 31.

34.5 The Life and Military Career of Antoni Desclergue until 1640

34.5.1 The Siege of Ostend and the Death of his Father Jeroni and Uncle Jeronimo de Montoya

As a child, Antoni (DC06) witnessed the Siege of Ostend, where his two paternal uncles, Enric (DC05c) and Antoni (DC05b), were involved and where his father, Jeroni (DC05), and maternal uncle died.

Indeed, Jeroni (DC05) was killed on September 27, 1604, in Ostend and left behind a pregnant widow and children, including Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06). Antoni's brother Miguel (DC06b) would be born later and baptized in Tournai.

Note that Antoni's uncle Jeronimo de Montoya died earlier during the Siege. It is even likely that the Santa Maria fortress was nicknamed 'Jeronimo de Montoya' after him, though we need further evidence to prove this.

For more information, refer to Chapter 31, Chapter 29.10.7, Chapter 32.2.2, and Chapter 33.3.6.

34.5.2 The Truce Between the Northern and Spanish Netherlands 1609-1621 and How it Ended

From 1609 until 1621, there was a truce between the Northern Netherlands and the Spanish Netherlands, or in other words, between Spain and the Dutch Republic. This truce, shown in Figures 34.15, 34.16, 34.17, 34.18, 34.19, 34.20, 34.21, 34.22, 34.23, had been negotiated by Ambrogio Spinola with whom Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), while Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was still a toddler, had sieged Ostend. Spinola would later be the Supreme Commander of Antoni (DC06) during the Siege of Bergen op Zoom in 1622 and the Siege of Breda in 1624-1625, explained in Chapter 34.5.5 and Chapter 34.5.6.

The truce between the Dutch and the Spanish, primarily negotiated by Johan van Oldenbarnevelt (1547-1619) (see Figure 34.24), was met with mixed reactions from the Dutch side. Johan van Oldenbarnevelt, a pragmatic financial overseer, saw the truce as an opportunity, whereas Maurice of Nassau (1567-1625), a cautious military strategist, viewed it with suspicion. Their divergent perspectives came to a head during the Battle of Nieuwpoort in 1600. Johan's decision to capture Duinkerken from the Spanish, against Maurice's advice, escalated tensions between the two, ultimately resulting in Johan's assassination in The Hague on May 13, 1619.

During the truce, internal divisions plagued the Dutch Republic. Without a common external enemy, political factions clashed over religious interpretations and the governance of the Dutch states, as outlined in the Treaty of Utrecht. This internal strife culminated in Johan van Oldenbarnevelt's conviction and execution for high treason, a process which, although legal in appearance, was steeped in political maneuvering. With Johan's removal, resistance to renewing the war with Spain diminished.

The truce primarily stemmed from mutual financial exhaustion and war-weariness among the populace. In the South, the lack of support for Calvinism and the continuation of life under Spanish rule, as evidenced in church documents (see Figure 34.25), contrasted with the North, where Catholicism was suppressed.

The truce's end can be attributed to several factors. The ease of travel during the ceasefire allowed Northerners to visit relatives in the South, revealing the Spanish regime's relative prosperity and happiness, contradicting Dutch propaganda. This led to fears that wealthy and industrious citizens, particularly those of Flemish and Walloon descent, might return to Belgium, potentially destabilizing the Dutch economy.

Alain Desrousseaux's research[8] highlights the significant contributions of these refugees to the flourishing textile industry in Leyden from 1550 onwards.

The Dutch aimed to disrupt Spanish trade routes globally, while the Spanish sought to reclaim the Northern Netherlands, believing that many regions had not voluntarily embraced Protestantism. Additionally, global competition between the two nations intensified, with the Dutch using the truce to advance their commercial interests, much to the Spaniards' dismay.

The global rivalry between the Dutch and the Spanish was crucial in ending the truce. The Spanish perceived the Dutch as exploiting the ceasefire to emerge as global competitors. On the other hand, the Dutch sought to expand their territories and influence in the Americas and Asia, which the peace hindered. This rivalry is explored in detail in Chapter 57.29, which examines the Dutch-Iberian conflicts.

The principle of Mare Liberum, articulated by Hugo Grotius in 1609, underscored the Dutch's desire for free navigation and trade, which clashed with Spanish interests. During the Austrian period, this principle was challenged by the Dutch, preventing the Belgians from maritime activities until Charles Philippe de Patin's evolved version of Mare Liberum gained international support, as discussed in Chapter 70.6 and 70.6.10.

The truce officially ended around 1621 with renewed military activities between the Dutch and the Spanish in Antwerp. One of the Dutch justifications for resuming the war was the Spanish demand for religious freedom for Catholics in the Northern Netherlands while denying the same to Calvinists in the Spanish Netherlands. This issue of reciprocity was significant, particularly considering King Felipe II's campaigns against Nassau in staunchly Catholic regions occupied by Protestants. When towns were predominantly and voluntarily Protestant, the King made peace.

During the truce, Carlos Coloma returned to Flanders as the governor of Cambrai in 1617, recruiting Antoni Desclergue (DC06) as indicated in Chapter 34.5.3. Desclergue likely focused on the Belgian-French border during the ceasefire and later participated in military actions against the Dutch, as detailed in chapters starting with Chapter 34.5.4.

In conclusion, the truce between the Dutch and Spanish unraveled due to internal Dutch conflicts, global competition, and strategic considerations. The Dutch sought to curtail Spanish trade dominance, while the Spanish aimed to reclaim the Northern Netherlands and counter Dutch expansion. The resumption of the war was driven by these complex, interwoven factors, ultimately shaping the trajectory of both nations in the early 17th century.

The end of the truce in 1621 can be attributed to the rise of a new Spanish regime. King Felipe III died on March 31, 1621, and was succeeded by the young King Felipe IV. The will of Felipe III is presented in Figures 34.26, 34.27, and 34.28. The daily politics of the new reign were largely influenced by Gaspar de Guzmán y Pimentel (Rome 1587 - Toro 1645), who significantly increased the Spanish military presence in the Netherlands, bringing troop numbers to approximately 60000 under the command of Ambrogio Spinola (Genoa 1569 - Castelnuovo Scrivia 1630). Military costumes from that era are illustrated in Figure 34.14 on page 525.

André Woestijn[9] noted an increase in activity in Harelbeke from 1621 onwards. Ships transported large quantities of ammunition on the Leie. Although the main theaters of war were in the North and the South, the Castellany of Kortrijk faced ongoing challenges due to the winter quartering of soldiers, particularly from the end of October to the beginning of April. During 1621-1639, various armies in Spanish service traversed the country. As Woestijn observed, Harelbeke hosted numerous lodgings for Spanish, Irish, English, Italian, and German soldiers. This situation placed a significant financial burden on Harelbeke, as evidenced by the accounts from these years. The town also received loans from the King to help finance these efforts. Records of troops quartered in Kortrijk between 1620 and 1653 can also be found in the town's archives.[10]

34.5.3 An Event which may have Triggered Antoni to Join the Armed Forces: the Comet on Christmas 1618

Around Christmas in 1618, a comet was visible in the sky. The event shocked the Northern and Southern Netherlands. Literature on the occasion was also written in the Northern Netherlands. People were scared because, during the truce, the comet appeared while the Dutch still had Ostend's loss on their minds during the supernova of 1604. We can refer, for instance, to 'Aenmerckinghe op de tegenwoordige steert-sterre,' by Jacob Cat, 1619. Amsterdam was also in the middle of a pest epidemic; Johan Oldenbarnevelt was in jail, the 30-year European conflict had recently started; times were uncertain, and the comet frightened the Dutch. It's not hard to imagine that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was reminded of his father's death in 1604 at Ostend while watching this comet. Likely, the comet triggered him to join the Spanish armed forces and to continue his father's legacy. In Chapter 29.12, we have also explained that there were indications that there were more Spanish military barracks in the period 1609-1625 than usual in the area of Harelbeke. As a consequence, Antoni (DC06) was more accessible for recruitment.

34.5.4 The Siege of Gulik, 1621-1622

Gulik is currently located in Germany and is known as Jülich. The Dutch had taken the city 12 years before the Siege. The Siege occurred from September 5, 1621, until February 3, 1622, shown in Figures 34.30 and 34.31. The Spanish forces led by Ambrogio Spinola and Hendrik van de Bergh kept the Dutch troops away from the city until the inhabitants realized that help could never arrive and would, therefore, surrender. The Spanish allowed everyone who wanted to leave the town to relocate to Nijmegen. Indeed, the Spanish did not want to defeat the inhabitants but merely wanted the city's location and infrastructure for future use for the winter quarter.

The Spanish were so dominant in 1622 that they decided to use the gained impetus and conquer Bergen op Zoom that same year, described in Chapter 34.5.5. To the reader who is interested in more detail, we refer to Tirion[11], Geysbeek[12], Siccama[13], Arend[14], Le Clerc[15], Nederlandsch Museum[16], van Loon[17], Staatkundige historie van Holland[18], Schuer[19], Bosscha[20], and Blomhert[21].

The violence in and near Gulik resulted in fugitives fleeing east to places such as Scherpenheuvel, as can be read in Figure 34.46 on page 540.

34.5.5 The Siege of Bergen Op Zoom and Steenbergen, 1622

Ambrogio Spinola, shown in Figure 34.32, with whom Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) had performed the Siege of Ostend and died there in 1604, had negotiated the 12-year truce with the Dutch and now felt betrayed due to their global expansion at the expense of Spain. Spinola received support from some inhabitants and the Catholics of Halsteren to take back Bergen op Zoom, which convinced him to get to work.

The last time Bergen of Zoom was Sieged was in 1588 by Alexander Farnese, the Duque of Parma. Spinola, who had a much better reputation than Farnese, likely wanted to succeed where Farnese had failed. The Siege lasted from July 18, 1622, until October 2, 1622.

At the onset of the Siege, the Catholics of Bergen Op Zoom welcomed the Spanish by opening the city's gates. However, Protestants were able to close the gates again, and this is when the Siege began. Spinola's strategy was to send the garrison of Henrik van den Bergh to Kleef, followed by Don Luis de Velasco.

Luis de Velasco arrived in Flanders in 1691, significantly later than Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). The existing literature shows that he came by the Spanish road, described in Chapter 8.10. In 1695, he very likely met Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) as they both attended the attack on the city of Hoei, described in Chapter 29.5.19, and liberated it from the Dutch who had taken it shortly before. Unlike Jeroni, he did not participate in the Siege of Cambrai but did participate in the Siege of Calais with Diego Durango, described in Chapter 29.5.21. In 1597, on October 30, Luis de Velasco received, in Kortrijk, a permit to return to Spain. He would later return, participate in the early days of the Siege of Ostend, and then be promoted to Captain-General of the Cavalry in Flanders, a position he would hold for 22 years. He was married to a Flemish.

Note that both militaries were involved in the Siege of Calais in 1596. Luis de Velasco died in Dunkerque in 1625. He was murdered, probably as revenge for evil behavior.

Meanwhile, in Bergen op Zoom, Luis de Velasco, with his troops, could take Steenbergen but could not take Bergen op Zoom. The reason is that Michiel de Ruyter, from the Northern Netherlands, could arrive by sea at the city and attack the camp of the remaining troops of Spinola with cannons. Spinola, being attacked from within the city as well as from the ship of de Ruyter, lost numerous men before the arrival of Maurits of Orange, with Peter Ernst II von Mansfeld (who supported the Dutch in return for money), on October 2, who, because the Spanish troops were so weakened, could rescue his city. Spinola and Luis de Velasco, with their forces, had to flee. Spinola had lost almost 8000 men during the Siege (5000 casualties, 3000 deserters). The Dutch still cherish a song related to the event. The song goes as follows:

Merck toch hoe sterck nu in 't werck sich al steld,
Die 't allen tijd' so ons vrijheit heeft bestreden.
Siet hoe hij slaeft, graeft en draeft met geweld,
Om onse goet en ons bloet en onse steden.

Hoort Maraens trompetten!
Siet hoe komt hij trecken aen,

Trekt hij flux heen op de been met al sijn heeren.
Cordua kruijd spoedig voort,

’ t Vlas was niet te spinnen

’ t Stut de Spaensche scharen;

In July 1622, the town of Steenbergen was captured by Luis de Velasco. An anecdote from this period illustrates the tensions between the local population and the military efforts to defend the city. The inhabitants of Steenbergen, who were favorable to the Spanish, were particularly distressed when Governor Borwater received additional cannons from Prince Maurits to fortify the city against the advancing Spanish forces. The resistance to this defense measure was notably led by the women of Steenbergen, who vehemently opposed the reinforcement.

In a dramatic act of defiance, these women threw the man delivering the cannons into the harbor, preventing the delivery of the much-needed artillery. As a result, the city remained defenseless, facilitating its capture by the Spanish without significant resistance.

However, the strategic significance of Steenbergen quickly diminished for the Spanish. Within a few months, the Dutch forces recaptured the town. The primary reason for this shift was the Spanish failure to capture the nearby city of Bergen op Zoom. Without Bergen op Zoom, maintaining control of Steenbergen became strategically redundant and logistically burdensome for the Spanish. Consequently, the town reverted to Dutch control as the Spanish abandoned it.

34.5.6 The Siege of Breda, 1624-1625

Before describing the Siege of Breda, it is noteworthy to mention Antoni Desclergue’s (DCO6) presence at Dudzele, near Damme, in the winter of 1624-1625. During this period, he served as godfather to Martina de la Cruz, who later married his son Antoni Desclergue (DC07). Antoni (DC06) is referred to as Antoni Desclergue ’junior,’ indicating awareness of Antoni Desclergue ’senior’ (DC05b), who had served in the Damme area earlier in the 1600s. Additional information is provided in Chapter 37.4.

Breda, a fortified town in the Dutch States near the Spanish Duchy of Brabant, was attacked by Spanish troops in 1624 and 1625 under the command of Ambrogio Spinola (1569-1630).

The Spanish strategy aimed to conquer Breda and subsequently launch quicker attacks to dismantle the Dutch States. Conversely, Dutch control over Breda allowed them to attack the Spanish Netherlands swiftly.

Spinola was also motivated by personal honor, seeking to redeem his reputation following the failed Siege of Bergen op Zoom, discussed in Chapter 34.5.5. Contrary to the typical springtime siege, Spinola’s late-season attack caught the Dutch off guard, forcing them into an immediate offensive. After Prince Maurice, Frederik Hendrik attempted to relieve the city and disrupt Spanish supply lines.

The twelve-year truce between Spain and the Netherlands had fostered substantial growth for the Dutch, enabling them to rebuild and restore their country. The peace also opened new opportunities in America and Asia, as detailed in Part XII. However, the truce’s end in 1621 led to significant Spanish blockades. Consequently, the Dutch had to supply their new territories with weapons and men heavily, resulting in high costs and decreased revenues, thus precipitating an economic and military crisis.

Both Spain and the Netherlands desired peace, albeit with different immediate objectives. The Dutch sought to regain strength while fortifying their country, giving an illusion of desiring peace. Spain, recognizing the global instability’s disadvantage compared to Dutch gains, set two critical demands: free access to the Scheldt and the port of Antwerp, and freedom for Spanish-minded Catholics within the Dutch State to practice their faith. The conquest of Breda was intended to strengthen Spain’s negotiating position.

Breda was strategically significant, fortified by Hendrik III of Nassau inspired by modern European fortifications and situated on the Mark River, facilitating defensive flooding. The city was well-stocked to endure a nine-month siege, with a large army and well-equipped inhabitants.

The Spanish army command during the occupation shifted from Ambrogio Spinola to Hendrik van de Bergh, then to Jan van Nassau-Siegen, with Carlos Coloma de Sa commanding reserve troops from November 1624. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Carlos Coloma likely participated in the Siege from November 1624 within the reserve troops. The heraldic shield of Coloma is depicted in Figure 34.71. At the time, Antoni was relatively young, while more prominent roles might have been played by his uncles Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) or Enric Desclergue (DC05c), who were in their fifties.

The attack on Breda commenced on July 21, 1624, in Brussels under Spinola's leadership. The army was divided into three to create confusion and maintain flexibility between targeting Breda or Grave. Ultimately, Spinola chose Breda over s' Hertogenbosch, considering the potential conflict with France.

By August 26, the approach to Breda began, aiming to capture surrounding villages for logistical support, followed by encircling Breda.

The Spanish formed two defensive circles around the city to protect their troops from Dutch attacks and potential Dutch relief armies. These defenses included a man-made moat and a five-foot elevation, with the inner and outer circles having circumferences of 17 km and 40 km, respectively. Unlike traditional sieges, Spanish soldiers conducted these operations themselves, receiving extra pay. The supply line from Lier and Herentals faced disruptions due to Dutch attacks, leading to Spanish starvation. Nevertheless, the Siege succeeded as the Dutch supply to Breda was cut off, resulting in scarcity and hunger.

Breda, as seen in Figure 34.33, surrendered to Spinola on June 5, 1625, and Dutch soldiers allowed an honorable retreat. The conquest of Breda was globally significant, reinforcing Spain's position in 1625. However, subsequent Dutch resilience, bolstered by new taxes, French aid, and the capture of the Spanish treasure fleet, eventually led to their resurgence. Around 700 Protestant homes were vacated as residents relocated, while Catholics celebrated newfound religious freedom. Breda was recaptured by the Dutch States in 1637 following Frederik Hendrik's successful Siege.

Evidence of Italian troops residing in Kortrijk in 1627-1628 is documented in the town's archives[22].

34.5.7 The French-Dutch Alliance against the Habsburgs

During the 1630s and 1640s, France sought to achieve autonomy from the Spanish Habsburgs' dominance. Alicia Esteban Estríngana[23] offers a valuable perspective on this endeavor, providing an assessment of its accomplishments.[24]

The capture of Trier by troops from the Duchy of Luxembourg, commanded by the 'Cardinal-Infante,' and the subsequent expulsion of the French garrison on March 26, 1635, is recognized as a pivotal event leading to Louis XIII's declaration of war on May 19, 1635. Following the capture of Trier, the French response, or lack thereof, raised doubts about the effectiveness of Richelieu's protection policy towards the Swedes, a policy maintained since 1631. This inactivity highlighted the military weakness of the Bourbon monarch. The apprehension of Elector Felipe Cristóbal de Sötern by the prince and his transfer to Flanders with the Emperor's awareness prompted France to take action to protect its Catholic allies. The treaty legitimized France's overt involvement in the Thirty Years' War.

France's protection of Trier was part of its broader strategy to extend protection to Catholic sovereign principalities and independent Catholic cities along the kingdom's eastern and northeastern borders between Lorraine and the Rhine. This strategy, initiated in late 1631, aimed to gain regional power through strategic occupation along the riverbanks, making Louis XIII a significant figure in European history.

Duke Charles IV of Lorraine, a consistent pro-Habsburg supporter, invited imperial forces to seize Vic and Moyenvic in the Metz diocese. Since the mid-16th century, France had protected Metz, Vic, Moyenvic, Toul, and Verdun, all affiliated with the Metropolitan Church of the Archdiocese of Trier.

[24] Estríngana's analysis primarily focuses on the period between 1635 and 1646, encompassing the initial stages of the conflict between Louis XIII and Philip IV and the conclusion of Philip IV's dual wars in Flanders. Following 1646, the United Provinces' military operations ceased, and hostilities were limited to the region near the French border.

In this painting, we observe Justinus van Nassau surrendering and handing over the city's key to Spinola and Spain. Carlos Coloma stands behind Spinola. It is intriguing to imagine a relative in the picture as well. The first candidate, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was 23 years old at the time and likely had not yet advanced sufficiently in his military career to be included in the painting. However, his uncles, Antoni Desclergue (DC05b) or Enric Desclergue (DC05c), would have been in their 50s and could plausibly fit into the artwork if they were present. If one of the latter were in the painting, the person behind Spinola with a round bald head appears to be a plausible candidate.*

Count-Duke Gaspar de Guzmán of Olivares purchased it in 1633, reaching his political peak. Born in Rome on January 6, 1587, Gaspar de Guzmán, 3rd Count of Olivares, served King Felipe IV and died in Toro, Zamora, on July 22, 1645. Son of Spanish diplomat Enrique de Guzmán, he studied canon law in Salamanca, joining the Court of Philip III. He became Count of Olivares in 1607 and married his cousin, Inés de Zúñiga e Velasco. Francisco de Sandoval, Duke of Lerma, named him chamberlain in 1615. Olivares rose to power in 1621 and held various key positions. He aimed for domestic reform while dealing with war, but economic strategies faltered. He presented the Great Memorial in 1624, proposing legal consistency and centralized administration. The Union of Arms aimed to share war costs but faced resistance. The war with the United Provinces resumed with mixed results. Financial struggles and military defeats eroded Spain's influence in Europe. Olivares attempted an authoritarian reform but faced resistance, leading to rebellion. Portugal's uprising in 1640 granted independence, and Olivares lost political credibility. He was banished to Loeches, then sent to Toro and the Inquisition, where he died in 1645. Olivares' authoritarianism was unpopular, and Spain's decline became evident. His failure marked the impending fall of Spanish predominance to France, and the monarchy couldn't adapt to European progress. In summary, Gaspar de Guzmán, Count-Duke of Olivares, played a significant role in Spanish politics during the reign of Felipe IV but faced challenges and ultimately fell from power, contributing to Spain's decline on the European stage.*

France's injunction in December 1631, ignored by both the Duke and the Emperor, led to the first French invasion of Lorraine. This military incursion captured both fortifications and the Treaty of Vic's enforcement upon Charles IV on January 6, 1632. The treaty granted France transit rights and access to the Rhine, establishing a garrison and securing military control over Lorraine, maintaining a semblance of neutrality in potential conflicts with the Habsburgs.

France presented these protective measures as an independent response to the Swedish allies' and Protestant factions' success in the Battle of Breitenfeld. The battle, on September 17, 1631, in Saxony, and the subsequent Swedish capture of Mainz in December 1631, benefitted France, making the French protection treaties neutral in the France-Habsburg struggle.

The Habsburg Emperor Ferdinand II, supported by the Catholic League and Felipe IV of Spain, saw France's diplomatic engagements with various princes and Alsace's free cities documented until spring-summer 1634. Unlike the Elector of Cologne and the Prince-Bishop of Liège, the Elector of Trier abandoned the Habsburg client network for Ferdinand of Wittelsbach, Duke Maximilian of Bavaria's brother.

The final French takeover of Lorraine occurred in the summer of 1634, following the Treaty of Nancy on September 26, 1633, establishing France's 'system of protection' in the Meuse, Moselle, and Rhine regions. In June 1632, the United Provinces initiated a strategic incursion into loyal countries through the Meuse Valley, seizing multiple cities and laying siege to Maastricht, leveraging a noble conspiracy advocating for French intervention to expel Spanish forces from Flanders. This effort involved a coordinated dual invasion, with the Maastricht siege concluding in August 1632.

Louis XIV of France benefitted from the 1632 military war with Orange, gaining military advantage near the French-occupied Trier, escalating concerns over the French-Dutch alliance. Brussels believed France and the Republic would negotiate a new treaty to invade loyalist provinces during the 1633 campaign. France controlled the region between Luxembourg and the Rhine from Trier, impeding German military support. The League of Heilbronn facilitated the blockade establishment,[25] uniting Swedish forces with Protestant sympathizers in western empire regions, including Frankia, Swabia, and Upper Rhineland. This partnership and the French military presence in Lorraine threatened Italy-Flanders connections, making Flanders more vulnerable. The Alsatian campaign, led by the Duke of Feria from summer to fall 1633, failed to alleviate Flanders' dire circumstances.

The apprehension in Brussels was substantiated. The Franco-Dutch alliance was formalized by a fourth treaty, updated on April 15, 1634. A fifth offensive pact on February 8, 1635, outlined a combined invasion strategy. The deal stipulated a March 1635 military campaign in Flanders to liberate it from Felipe IV.

From April 1634 to February 1635, significant developments within the Holy Roman Empire prompted France's consequential decisions. The successful Habsburg military collaboration led to a decisive victory at the Battle of Nördlingen on September 5-6, 1634. This collaboration enabled the House of Austria to assume offensive initiative and safeguard the empire from detrimental forces, destabilizing the region and creating uncertain prospects for Sweden.

The Protestants, initially allied with Sweden, withdrew their support between November 1634 and February 1635, renouncing the Treaties of Pirna. This led to their reconciliation with the Emperor and the Catholic faction. This reconciliation culminated in the Peace Treaty of Prague on May 30, 1635, officially approved by the Elector of Saxony in mid-June following successful mediation

A 1576 notary document to evidence the ancestral bloodline did not go any further back in time; therefore we have no reasons to assume that Berenguer was the patrilineal ancestor of Pere Torró y Desclergue (I), although he had the same name and was a notary in Montblanc too. He appears with his brother Galceran (Petrus de Clerico and Galcerandus Desclerico) in a notarial document of Agusust 1, 1494, testified by Raymundo Berenger Desclergue (his uncle) in Santa Coloma de Queralt. 1494 is when their father Francesc Torró i Miquel died.

The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclerçue y Cortés.

34.5.8 The defence of 's Hertogenbosch in 1629 and Bruges in 1631

Bois-le-Duc or 's Hertogenbosch, shown in Figure 34.35 is known in Spanish as Bolduque and is, in the Netherlands, often called Den Bosch.

The period 1629-1634 is quite particular because we observe a joint involvement of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), as well as his uncles Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) and Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c). Given the age of the two latter, we must assume that they had more of an administrative and leading role in the Spanish army than the much younger and energetic Antoni (DC06). In particular, the two elderly brothers were most definitely involved in the Spanish actions undertaken to protect the city in 1931, given their proximity to the town.

A decade later, we found an exciting reference concerning Tielt and Wingene, where the Desclergue brothers resided near the end of their lives, and which area belonged to the Casselrye of Kortrijk. In the financial accounts of the town Tielt,[26] we found two references to Spanish troops originating in Iberia and Italy, as follows: 'Loys De Caigny tavernier in tSchaeck van taire tsynen huyse ghedaen byde loopende soldaeten,' on page 362, and also 'Loys De Caigny tavernier in tSchaeck van taire tsynen huyse ghedaen byde loopende soldaeten' on page 362.

The Spanish Crown often went bankrupt in the 1600s, partly due to exuberant interest rates on bank loans and partly due to the sometimes late arrival of silver from the New World. The massive influx of silver from the New World also caused strong European inflation. The authorities used the money for many purposes, such as erecting beautiful, functional buildings in Spanish areas all over Europe. The resources were also used for warfare, mainly against the Turkish and partly against the Protestants, such as the Dutch and the English, or France. Also, in Asia, competition between the Spanish[27] and the Dutch VOC required vast resources. The money they paid to soldiers was injected into the economy where they resided. Additional local funding for the Spanish armies mostly went to locally recruited soldiers. In 1625, the Spaniards conquered Breda and appeared supreme, but the tide quickly turned in the financial world, and bankruptcy was continually lurking.

For example, in 1627, the Spanish Crown went bankrupt again. In 1628, the Spanish treasure fleet was lost and stolen by Piet Hein and his pirates from the West Indian Company (WIC). It meant that Spain was financially weak at that time, while the Dutch States were powerful and, above all, very enthusiastic. Furthermore, the heavyweight of Spanish military activity lay in Italy, where the Mantuan War of Succession had started, also involving France. The German emperor's support of Spain could not be expected either, as he fought a battle with Denmark. In short, it was the ideal time for the Dutch to strike and try to conquer a part of the Spanish areas. The Dutch set their sights on 's Hertogenbosch in 1629. A possible conquest of this city would significantly elevate the prestige of the Dutch, and it was also important from a military standpoint. Indeed, the town formed a bridgehead for the Spanish to attack the Dutch States. On the other hand, for the Spaniards, the city was also crucial in its defense strategy. Indeed, the city protected the deeper Spanish areas, such as Lier, Tienen, and Herentals, which were incredibly difficult to defend against attacks by the Dutch. Above all, s' Hertogenbosch was one of the four critical cities in Brabant, with a bishop's seat. Spain certainly wanted to retain this city. During the twelve-year truce, the Spaniards had extensively modernized the city defenses. However, this work still needed to be completed, so some of the fortress resisted modern warfare.

When the Dutch had surrounded the city, the Spaniards had to relieve it. It happened under the leadership of commander Hendrik Van de Bergh. However, the initiative came much too late, so the Dutch could have provided the city surroundings with additional defense mechanisms against Spanish attacks. The reasons for the late undertaking are stated above and were mainly financial. The States army, led by Frederik Hendrik, defended the city excellently by focusing on the town and anticipating Spanish attempts to attack the supply lines. For example, Frederik Hendrik flooded areas to limit the access roads to the city for the Spaniards.

The Spaniards knew it was impossible to relieve the town, but they launched an attack at the end of June, given its immense prestige. By the end of the summer, it became clear that the Spaniards would not relieve the city and that the encircling Dutch would conquer it. The state's army was also heavily weakened. For example, they had dug trenches from some directions, so-called 'approaches,' which were frequently left unpopulated. Had the city inhabitants communicated unimpeded with the Spaniards, they could have identified the weak spots along which the Spaniards could still have relieved the city. However, the Dutch had cut off all communication channels so that the two parties could not coordinate their attacks against the surrounding Dutch and could not point out the weak spots to each other. The city defended itself superbly. There were so many victims on the States' side that the remaining military only wanted to fight if paid a very high salary, as seen in the accounts from that time.

In time, however, the residents realized that their city was lost. There was a revolt, and they no longer wanted to support the defense. On September 11, the inhabitants punched a hole in the wall of a defensive bastion to let in the States' armies and end the hopeless situation during that uprising. Negotiations began on September 12, and the States allowed an exodus on September 17. The city then finally fell into Dutch hands. The Spanish could not prevent the Dutch from confiscating the properties of the Catholic churches. The exodus of city dwellers and soldiers was impressive. One thousand two hundred carts were used and formed a long procession from the city to the Spanish areas. The loss of s' Hertogenbosch was a thorn in the hearts of the Spaniards. Another similar loss would have been inconceivable.

When Bruges was threatened in 1631, the Spaniards, to whom the city was dear, not only for its history but also for the crucial graves, such as Figure 34.36, would not give up this city without a fierce fight.

The year before, Aytona had reported to the Court in Madrid that the situation was dire and that the Spaniards feared they would be unable to cope with the Dutch without new financing. One can read it in his letters, which are still stored in Brussels[28]. The fall of s' Hertogenbosch had uplifted the Dutch. Frederik Hendrik van Nassau turned out to be a competent captain, which made the Dutch very professional. The West of Belgium was neglected and had a weak defense since the most significant Spanish troop concentrations were in Germany.

[27] Spain and Portugal were united at that time

Spies had told the Spanish that the Prince of Orange had requested a large loan for Antwerp's Siege and 'another city.' So they knew that something was coming. Since Prime Minister Olivares did not have highly skilled Spanish noblemen who could rule the area, a military rule by Spaniards prevailed in the Southern Netherlands. The Marquis of Santa Cruz became the military commander-in-chief of the Southern Netherlands. This person was Álvaro de Bazán (1571-1646), 2nd Marquess of Santa Cruz, also known as Álvaro II de Bazán y Benavides. He was the son of the legendary Álvaro de Bazán, who is said to have never experienced defeat despite a very long military career.

At the beginning of June 1631, the Dutch States appeared with a great display of power at Bruges city. The most prominent city of West-Flanders, shown in Figure 34.37, could have turned Dutch had the Spanish not supported. The writings of Aytona and Carlos Coloma de Saa[29] attest to this. They are confirmed by notes made by residents of the town of Bruges. Coloma's account is essential to our family history, as the Desclergues were involved. Indeed, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), as well as his uncles Antoni Desclergue y Ratera (DC05b) and Enric Desclergue y Cortés (DC05c), were involved. Antoni (DC06) was still in the prime of his life and must have been engaged in the battle itself.

Until March 1631, Coloma had been a substitute ambassador for Spain in England. In the Spring of 1631, Carlos Coloma became Maestre de Campo in Flanders to better defend the area. He acted under the Marquis of Santa Cruz's command, who arrived with a large army on Easter Monday. As an attack on the coast was expected, the whole area from Dunkirk to the border with the Netherlands was placed under Luis de Benavides' authority. Fuentes was ordered to take a position to defend Bruges and Damme. We can, therefore, say that the Desclergues most likely supported the cities of Bruges and Damme with Fuentes. The Spanish recruited new military personnel from the Artois, Hainaut, and Luxembourg regions.

Felipe de Silva was also ordered to recruit German soldiers from the Palatinate region. Simultaneously, Walen and Geldern were not heavily defended; they also feared an attack from the Dutch. Some 40000 Dutch troops were then stationed by the Prince of Orange, between Emmerik and Rees, and were ready to invade Belgium. Although the Spaniards expected a significant attack on the coast, they noticed that the Dutch were moving downstream along the Rhine, forcing them to defend Antwerp more heavily.

Therefore, the most remarkable Spanish troop strength would nevertheless concentrate around Antwerp. Nonetheless, they feared an attack on Bruges, which caused Fuentes to defend the area more heavily.

On May 26, 1631, the Spaniards, led by Fuentes, left Moerbrugge to target Damme. The Dutch broke through around May 30, reached Yzendijke, and then moved to Sas van Gent. Ballo and Francisco Zapata's armies were stationed in that place but were too weak. These armies then marched to Zelzate, where Carlos Coloma joined them to advance to Heusden.

Diego Sanchez de Castro, the governor around Zelzate, had heard that the Dutch had reached Yzendijke to disembark in Watervliet. When Coloma and Zapata were informed, they decided to spy on the enemy from the village Philippine. Prisoners of war announced that it was not the Dutch intention to take Antwerp but to capture Sas van Gent. If this failed, then they would try to conquer Bruges. Coloma hastily sent a message to Antwerp, saying that he urgently needed reinforcements.

The Spaniards gathered efficiently and fast near Ghent and advanced to Bruges to defend the city. They were so sure Bruges was in danger because spies had reported that the Dutch had no heavy artillery. So, it could not have been the intention to attack Ghent, for example.

The Spaniards moved on beyond Saint George's fortress (Sint Joris or Sant Jori), which must have been remarkable for the Catalans, particularly the Desclergues with roots in Montblanc. Meanwhile, the cavalry resided near Aalter. On May 31, the Dutch reached Bruges. That means that they had disembarked more than 20000 foot-soldiers and 70 artillery pieces in three days and had advanced some 10 km.

In Bruges, the inhabitants locked themselves within the city walls for protection. At the same time, the Spaniards stayed at a reasonably considerable distance from the city to strike where necessary when the Dutch would take a position. The Dutch tried to negotiate with the bishop of Bruges, but he sided with the Catholics. When Spanish troops arrived at Bruges' city walls, the city admitted 3000 of them, and the Bishop of Bruges reported this fantastic fact to the Bishop of Ghent at the Spanish Castle. The inclusion of Spaniards in the city was a disappointment for the Dutch. It meant that the residents of Bruges did not want the Dutch and took sides with the Spaniards. Then, the Dutch, disillusioned and very frustrated, withdrew. During the retreat, they lost another 1000 men, killed or captured by the Spanish. The Spaniards were not immediately aware of the withdrawal; hence, they attacked. The facts described above are discussed more in R. Bottelberge and T. Colom Aguilar's work, 'Brugge in 1631 bedreigd en ontzet.'

Isabella of Spain died in 1633, and Flanders was governed ad interim by Francisco de Moncada, the Marquis of Aytona, until Ferdinand of Austria's arrival.

Antoni (DC06) was also involved in Leuven, as described in the following section.

34.5.9 The Siege of Leuven, 1635

In the year 1635, France experienced significant political shifts. Concerned about the strong Habsburg presence on its borders, France, a staunch Catholic power that had recently suppressed the Huguenot rebellions domestically, declared war and supported the Protestant Anti-Habsburg states. This strategic move underscored France's geopolitical priorities over religious affiliations.

Initially, France's military campaign faced setbacks. An invasion of the Spanish Netherlands was unsuccessful, resulting in a French retreat to their borders for several years. However, the tide turned in 1643 with the Battle of Rocroi, where French forces achieved a decisive victory.

The involvement of Antoni (DC06) in the events of 1635, particularly in the Battle of Leuven, remains uncertain. However, it is plausible that he played a role. Kortrijk, depicted in Figure 34.39, was a Spanish stronghold. In 1635, French and Dutch forces united against the Spanish in Leuven, as shown in Figure 34.38. The Spanish defense was led by Anthonie Schetz, Baron of Grobbendonk and Lord of Wezenmaal.

At the same time, the Dutch forces were commanded by Frederik Hendrik van Oranje, and the French by Urbain de Maillé-Brezé and Gaspard III de Coligny.

The Siege of Leuven, conducted by the Dutch and French forces, lasted from June 24 to July 4, 1635. Despite their efforts, the siege was unsuccessful, resulting in a Spanish victory.

34.5.10 Meanwhile in the World

A full description of the global situation in the 15th and 17th centuries would indeed be fascinating but would require a comprehensive volume.

Therefore, only some key facts to be considered while reading about this period are mentioned here. For a deeper understanding of the Portuguese endeavors in the centuries and decades preceding this period, refer to Part XII.

From 1580 until 1640, the Iberian Union united Spain and Portugal under a single monarch, creating significant implications for global trade, colonization, and cultural exchange. Although Spain and Portugal remained distinct entities, their unification facilitated a broader Spanish influence in Asia and profoundly affected the balance of power and commerce. During this time, the Iberian Union enabled a unique amalgamation of Iberian and Asian interactions, contributing to a rich cultural and economic exchange.

The Iberian Union's impact on global trade was immense, especially as Portugal was deeply involved in the Eighty Years' War (1568-1648) against the Habsburg rule in the Netherlands. This prolonged conflict, the Dutch Revolt, significantly strained Portuguese resources and opened opportunities for Dutch maritime expansion. The Dutch, who had previously relied on Portuguese spice imports, were compelled to establish trade routes to Asia. This necessity birthed the Dutch Golden Age, marked by rapid economic and colonial expansion.

Until 1595, Spanish and Portuguese fleets dominated the world's oceans, effectively monopolizing global maritime trade. The Treaty of Tordesillas (1494) divided the world between these two powers, granting them exclusive rights to explore and colonize vast territories. However, having acquired knowledge of Portuguese trade routes, the Dutch began challenging this dominance. They formed private trading companies, initially owned by wealthy families from the Dutch provinces and the Southern Netherlands (modern-day Belgium). These enterprises laid the foundation for establishing the Dutch East India Company (VOC) in 1602. The VOC, or Verenigde Oostindische Compagnie, was officially called 'Generale Vereenichde Geoctroyeerde Compagnie.'

The VOC, or Vereenigde Oostindische Compagnie, was a groundbreaking entity that marked the dawn of modern capitalism. It was a company rather than a nation-state, driven by profit rather than territorial ambitions. The VOC's success in Asia was unparalleled, yet its operations often lacked ethical considerations. While the Portuguese had a reputation for integrating with local populations through intermarriage and relatively humane governance, the VOC was predominantly driven by economic gains and strategic alliances.

Historical records highlight the contrasting approaches of the Portuguese and the Dutch. The Portuguese were more inclined towards cultural assimilation and fostering local alliances, treating indigenous populations equally. In contrast, the VOC was notorious for its exploitative practices, deceitful tactics, and prioritization of profit over ethical considerations. The VOC's workforce was diverse, comprising Dutch nationals and Germans, Danes, French, and Belgians, all contributing to the company's global exploits and, at times, its notorious misdeeds.

The VOC's aggressive expansion is exemplified by its conquest of key strategic locations. In 1641, they captured Malacca from the Portuguese, a pivotal trading hub in Southeast Asia. By 1658, they had seized control of Ceylon (modern-day Sri Lanka), further consolidating their regional dominance. Conquests by the VOC typically involved the transfer of governance and economic control rather than wholesale slaughter or forced repatriation of local populations. The VOC's methods often included forging alliances based on false promises and exploiting local power dynamics to their advantage, demonstrating their adeptness at political maneuvering.

In the Americas, the presence of the Dutch was equally significant. From 1609, they explored and settled parts of the New World, most notably establishing a foothold in the Hudson River Valley. Henry Hudson, an Englishman employed by the VOC, explored this region in search of a northwest passage to Asia. In 1624, the first Dutch colonists arrived. Peter Minuit famously purchased Manhattan Island from the Lenape Native Americans, laying the foundation for New Amsterdam, which would later become New York City. The Dutch approach to colonization in North America reflected their mercantile ethos, emphasizing trade, commerce, and pragmatic relations with indigenous peoples.

The Dutch influence extended to the Caribbean and South America. They captured the islands of Aruba, Curaçao, and Sint Maarten from the Spanish in 1634, transforming them into profitable centers of trade and commerce under the aegis of the Dutch West India Company (WIC). The Dutch also established colonies in the Guianas, including Essequibo (1616) and Berbice (1627), consolidating their presence in the region.

The Dutch colonial enterprise cannot be divorced from the broader geopolitical context of European rivalries and alliances. The Treaty of Breda (1667), which concluded the Second Anglo-Dutch War, saw the Dutch cede New Netherland (including New Amsterdam) to the English and renamed it New York. In return, the Dutch retained control of valuable sugar-producing territories in the Caribbean, underscoring the interplay between European conflicts and colonial possessions.

In conclusion, the period from 1635-1640 was marked by significant geopolitical shifts and colonial expansions driven by the ambitions of European powers. The Iberian Union, the rise of the VOC, and the Dutch incursions into the New World and Asia were pivotal events that reshaped global trade networks and cultural exchanges. These developments set the stage for the modern world, highlighting the complex interplay between European rivalries, colonial ambitions, and the relentless pursuit of wealth and power. Understanding these historical dynamics provides crucial insights into the foundations of contemporary global relations and the enduring legacies of colonialism.

34.5.11 1639-1641, the Period when Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) was in Spain

The Chapel at Deerlijk was not used until 1641, although construction began in 1639. This period coincides with Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) traveling to Spain, specifically to the house of the Desclergues (see Figure 34.45).

In 1639, the Spanish Road, detailed in Chapter 8.10, followed the route from Brussels to Leuven, Lummen, Köln, Bonn, Nordlingen, München, Innsbruck, Sondrio, Forte di Fuentes, Como, Milan, Genoa, and Barcelona. This route was crucial for moving troops and supplies during the Thirty Years' War, highlighting the strategic importance of Antoni's journey.

The fiscal records for 1639 and 1640 do not list Antoni Desclergue as a Burger (Bourgeois) of Kortrijk. Antoni was likely sent to Spain during this revolutionary time for multiple reasons. Born in Barcelona and fluent in French due to his baptism and partial upbringing in Tournai, Antoni had significant experience in combat against the French, likely participating in numerous skirmishes and battles given his background.

As was customary for military personnel, Antoni traveled to Spain with his entire family, likely with the soldiers he had recruited.

Figure 34.47: Waregem, October 8, 1626. The baptism of a twin of Anna Desclergue (DC06f) and Vincentius Staelens. The children were Petrus and Joannes. The godparents of Petrus were: Jean du Breucq ('Joannes de Bucker') and Godeliva Crispel. Joanna's godparents were Antoni Desclergue (DC06) (Anna's brother) and Judoca Van Brabant. The baptism is also shown in Figure 29.151 on page 432.

This movement of soldiers was part of a broader strategic redeployment of Spanish forces across Europe to respond to various military pressures.

During this period, soldiers from Belgium, Italy, and other regions were dispatched to Spain. Manel Güell notes that Juan de Garay was also sent from Italy to Spain by the Marquis of Leganés in 1639[30]. This occurred against the backdrop of ongoing wars with France, during which Spain had previously reinforced its troops in Flanders under the Duke of Olivares, as discussed by Moreno.[31]

Chapter 49 details Antoni's involvement in constructing the 'Kapel-ter-Ruste' chapel at Deerlijk and the artifacts he brought from Spain, which are linked to the legacy of King Felipe IV of Castile. This period saw the emergence of Diego de Silva y Velázquez as a royal court painter under the patronage of Felipe IV, known for supporting numerous artists, including Flemish ones such as Vrancx, Snaeyers, Molenaer, and de Hondt.

Two primary factors prompted Antoni Desclergue (DC06) to go to Spain: increased tensions between Spain and France in northern Catalonia and the planned Corts at Montblanc in 1640. However, the Catalan revolt and Beatrice's pregnancy disrupted these plans. The Guerra dels Segadors began in May 1640 (see Figure 34.40), and Beatrice, pregnant by early spring of 1640, returned to Deerlijk, where she baptized her son, Pere Desclergue (DC07d), in October 1640 (see Figures 34.49 and 36.25).

Antoni remained in Spain, returning only in 1641. His absence was noted in the baptismal records of his son Pere (DC07d), where the priest was confused about the family's names. The child's correct name, Pere or Pedro Desclergue y Declercq, was initially written as 'De Celcg Clerck,' then changed to 'Clerck,' and the mother's name was mistakenly spelled as 'De Clercke.'

The Corts had historically been held in Montblanc several times. Still, the planned 1640 session was canceled due to the ongoing war and the Catalan revolt[32]. While in Spain, Antoni likely visited his distant cousin José Riu y Desclergue (DC02dy2x1y1), a great-grandson of Galceran Desclergue (I=II) (DC02d), as discussed in Chapter 25.1.3.3. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) also attended the wedding of Isabel Desclergue (DC05ex1) to Jacint de Pedrolo in 1639, who died before his son's birth in January 1640. The initials of family members, including those of the newborn, were inscribed on the artwork Antoni brought back to Flanders, as detailed in Chapter 28.5.1 and Figures 49.36 and 49.37. Isabel Desclergue (DC05ex1), who also signed the artwork, was both Antoni's first and fourth cousin, being the daughter of Francesc Desclergue y Ratera, a (half)brother of Antoni's father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05).

Antoni's return to Flanders coincided with the reorganization of the Spanish army to reinforce Flanders against the French. In Spain, Ambrosio Spinola's son-in-law, Diego Mexía Felípez de Guzmán y Dávila, 1st Marquess of Leganés, was appointed to defeat the French armies in Catalonia (see Figure 34.41). During his stay in Spain, Antoni visited Madrid, where he likely met members of the royal court, including the artist Alonso Cano, who gave him a statue of Mary (see Figure 49.47) for the chapel in Deerlijk. It is unclear if Antoni brought the statue back in 1641 or Beatrice did so in 1640.

Antoni's return to Flanders occurred briefly when Catalonia was a republic under French sovereignty. In January 1641, King Louis XIII of France became the Count of Barcelona, and in 1643, Louis XIV assumed the title. Catalonia was not reincorporated into the Spanish Monarchy until 1652.

Eduardo de Mesa notes that the Irish forces of Tyrconnel, active in Spain, were sent to Roussillon in 1639 due to the French siege of the fortress of Salses north of Perpignan[33]. The Spanish troops, led by Filippo Spinola and Francesc de Tamarit, recaptured Salses on January 6, 1640. The French pressure on Catalonia and the presence of Spanish troops caused tension among the local population, leading to the Catalan revolt.

Gaspar de Guzmán y Pimentel Ribera y Velasco de Tovar, the Count-Duke of Olivares, fought the French on Catalan territory to persuade the Catalans to support the war efforts. He recruited nine thousand soldiers, likely including Antoni Desclergue (DC06), who had significant military experience from Flanders.

Antoni's return to Flanders involved bringing panels for the chapel of Deerlijk, inscribed with his initials (see Chapter 49.3.3.3 and Figures 49.36 and 49.37). The initial protest against the Spanish troops in Catalonia led to the Catalan revolt in May 1640.

Eduard Contijoch concludes that Antoni Desclergue likely participated in the Catalan revolt, although he was more likely aligned with the Spanish troops than the 'Segadors.' At the time of the revolt, Antoni and Beatrice were probably near Zaragoza, from where she returned home, while Antoni undertook the journey to Catalonia to restore Spanish control.

Significant attacks occurred on towns such as Perpignan in June 1640. Despite Spanish efforts to stabilize the region, Catalonia remained under French control for a decade, with northern Catalonia still remaining French.

34.5.12 Particular Case of a Soldier Recruited in Flanders who Remained near Montblanc

The historical inquiry into the life of a soldier recruited in Flanders, who eventually settled near Montblanc, offers a fascinating glimpse into the migratory patterns and social dynamics of 17th-century Europe. This specific case, meticulously researched by Rafael Piñero, highlights the interplay between local and international historical contexts, shedding light on individuals' movement across borders during significant military and political upheaval.

Rafael Piñero's investigations, communicated with the author with Josep Maria Grau's facilitation, are documented in Piñero's comprehensive book Tous-Girnonès Cal Canari 1529-2020.[34] The research uncovers the life of Pera Toussaint, a native of Jemappes near Mons in present-day Belgium. During the 17th century, this region was known as 'Flandes' to the Spanish, reflecting its

The father, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was absent, and therefore the priest was confused about the involved names. The child's correct Spanish name would have been Pere or Pedro Desclergue y Declercq. The priest first wrote 'De Celcg Clerck' , then changed it to 'Clerck' , and was then confused about the mother's name and decided to spell hers as 'De Clercke' . historical connection to the Spanish Netherlands. Pera Toussaint's journey from Jemappes to Montblanc, specifically to the village of Cabra del Camp, situated approximately two hours' walk from Montblanc, is a testament to the extensive networks that linked various parts of Europe.

His presence in Cabra del Camp is officially recorded through his marriage in 1646 to Joanna Maria Fortuny, a local woman. The wedding is documented in the church registers of Cabra, which provide a detailed account of his origins and his integration into the local community.

The marriage register, as shown in Figure 34.77, reads:

'Pera Toussaint, fadrí, natural del lloc de Jamape en lo Regne de Flandes y en Cabra habitant, fill de (...) Miguel Toussaint y Catherina, llur muller, naturals de dit lloch, and, Joanna Maria Fortuny.'

This entry confirms his Belgian roots and highlights his established residency in Cabra, indicating a significant personal transition from a soldier in a foreign land to a settled inhabitant of a small Spanish village. The case of Pera Toussaint is emblematic of broader historical phenomena, including the movement of soldiers across Europe due to the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648) and the subsequent social and cultural integration of these individuals into new communities. Toussaint's marriage to Joanna Maria Fortuny signifies blending different cultural backgrounds and forming new social ties, crucial for the local community's fabric during that era.

Furthermore, this case underscores the value of parish registers and local archives as vital sources for reconstructing individual life stories on an international platform and understanding larger historical patterns. The meticulous documentation by local church authorities provides historians with invaluable insights into demographic changes, social integration, and the personal histories of individuals who might otherwise remain obscure.

34.5.13 Specific Appearances of and Links to Antoni Desclergue in the area of Deerlijk

A selection of records is shown in Figures 34.47, 34.48, 34.49, 34.50, 34.51, 34.52, 34.54, and 34.55. The others can be found in Chapter 49, in constructing a chapel at Deerlijk. Further, we also give an overview of specific bonds with key witnesses of a miracle in Deerlijk in 1634. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was connected to all of them.

Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), with his wife Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), was in Deerlijk from 1631 onwards. When their daughter Maria was born, as described in Chapter 37.9.2, Beatrice appeared as a witness for the first time.

When their son Joan, described in Chapter 37.9.4, was born at Deerlijk in 1634, Jan Declercq, stepbrother of Antoni, was godfather, while Anne De Vos, daughter of Jan De Vos, was godmother. As indicated in Chapter 29.8.5, Chapter 48.3.2, and Chapter 48.4, the De Vos family was either Spanish or had close links with the Spanish army and would also help refugees who fled from the French army.

In Chapter 49.2.2, we clarify the bonds between Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the witnesses of the miracle in 1634 that would lead to permission to construct a chapel in 1639 in Deerlijk, which also involves de Vos.

In 1638, on September 9, at Deerlijk, shown in Figure 49.10 on page 998, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) served as godmother to Jan De Vos, son of Michael De Vos and Anna Tacks ('Tonne Tack'), while Jan Montens was godfather. From that time onward, she and Antoni were not found anywhere because they left for Spain to return in 1640 when the Spanish suffered in Catalonia during the Revolt. The first appearance in Deerlijk was Beatrice, who must have returned from Spain while pregnant, while most likely Antoni returned later. In Figure 34.49, the priest has deliberately used a different spelling for different families of origin' although the confusion was apparent, as indicated in the Figure caption.

Furthermore, the family De Witte (Du Blanc) must have been acquainted with the Desclergues because, in 1643, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) served as wedding witness of a certain Philippus De Witte and Judoca Declercq, i.e. (DK03dybx1) or possibly a relative of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx). The De Witte family also appears in Wingene, where we believe we have found the two brothers of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). Perhaps they are linked.

We found Antoni Desclergue as godfather on baptism in Deerlijk in 1643, September 20, to Margareta Blome, daughter of Franciscus Blome and Guilemla Mile; Godmother was Margareta Le Roy.

Another interesting example in Figure 34.53 is that of Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) as godfather on the baptism certificate at Deerlijk in 1644, of Maria Declercq (DK03dybx5), daughter of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) and Joanna Depoorter. The priest wrote 'Decleqs' for Pieter Declercq's branch, while he wrote 'Michael Le Clercgs' for Miguel to show a difference. The fact that Miguel Desclergue had been baptized in Tournai in 1605, as can be found in Chapter 29.9.6, may have played a role in the priest's decision to use the French spelling.

Interestingly, in 1647, we find Antoni Desclergue as godfather to a daughter of a certain Joanna Maes. In Chapter 48.3.2, we highlight the connection between the Desclergues and the Maes family; we also find him a witness for a family Dausach ('De Saux') in 1652, as can be found in Chapter 34.8. As shown in Chapter 48.3.2, in 1652, we found a link between the Desclergues and the De Vos families. Antoni Desclergues would later, in 1655, also serve as godfather to the daughter of Joanna De Vos, namely Judoca Windels.

It is important to note here that the De Vos family, which was clearly acquainted with Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), also housed refugees who had escaped from the area of Douai-Valenciennes under French attack and occupation in the 1650s, as shown in Figure 34.102 on page 557.

In Chapter 49 about the chapel constructed in Deerlijk, we add more exciting connections. It was indeed so that the records show that everyone involved in constructing that chapel was acquainted with Antoni Desclergue (DC06) or his wife, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx). With specific reference to the Chapel of Deerlijk and the witnesses involved in the miracle of 1634, we refer to Chapter 49.5 and Chapter 49.2.2 and specifically Figures 49.11 on page 998 (Montens, De Vos), 49.12 on page 998 (Montens, De Vos), 49.13 on page 999 (Kelduwier, Stalins), 49.14 on page 999 (Montens, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), Gilyct, Seynaeve), 49.15 on page 999 (Van Marcke, Wautier, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)), 49.16 on page 999 (Antoni Desclergue, Wautier, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)), 49.17 on page 999 (Kelduwier, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)), 49.18 on page 999 (Wolfcarius, Kelduwier, Beyls, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)), 49.19 on page 999 (Wolfcarius, Kelduwier, Valentin Bekaert), 49.20 on page 999 (Antoni Desclergue, Bekaert, de Croix / de la Cruz), 49.21 on page 999 (Jan Montens, Bekaert, Nicolaes Montens), 49.22 on page 999 (Decoop, Nicolaes Montens), 49.23 on page 1000 (Decostere, Vermandere), 49.13 on page 999 (Stalins, Kelduwier)[35], 49.24 on page 1000 (Kelduwier, Stalins, De Vos), 49.25 on page 1000 (Kelduwier, Stalins)[36], 49.26 on page 1000 (Stalins, la Motte Baraffe)[37], 49.27 on page 1000 (Pieter Wielandt), 49.28 on page 1000 (Pieter Wielandt, Hebbelynck), 49.29 on page 1000 (Casiere, de Bois, Noel Declercq father of Beatrice), 34.120 on page 559 (Oriol, Tani, Tani, Roman, Van Marcke) and 49.30 on page 1000 (Antoni Desclergue, Willem Van Marcke, Wautier).

34.5.14 Troops and their Families in the Area Deerlijk-Harelbeke-Kortrijk and their Impact on the Inhabitants During the Lifetime of Antoni Desclergue - Until his Departure for Spain in 1639

In Chapter 29.12 we have shown evidence of an excess presence of Spanish troops in the area of Harelbeke in the period 1609-1625, which will be further proven in the current section through church documents, such as Figures 34.56, 34.58, 34.59, 34.60, and 34.61. The church of Harelbeke is shown in Figure 34.57. Also, we referred already to André Woestijn's study[38]. He noticed in the records of Harelbeke town that from 1621 onward, there was more activity than in previous years. Ships transported a lot of ammunition on the Leie.

During 1621-1639, the country was crossed by various armies in Spanish service. As André Woestijn observed, in Harelbeke, there were many lodgings for Spanish, Irish, English, Italian and German soldiers. The burden was financially hefty for Harelbeke and can be observed in the accounts of these years. Harelbeke also received loans from the King to finance their efforts.

In 1620, it was apparent that the truce between the Spanish Netherlands and the Dutch States would not last. That's why, in 1620, there was a steady build-up of troops in Belgium again. The truce finally ended on April 9, 1621. Many troops were in the Casselrye of Kortrijk during winter, including Deerlijk, Harelbeke, Kortrijk up, and even Wingene. Soldiers who did not own property were quartered in the homes of the town's inhabitants and the neighboring villages. In return for modest financial support from the government, they had to provide the soldiers with food, water, a room with a bed, and a table. In the case of equestrians, they also had to give a stallion for the horse and look after the animal. The inhabitants were not happy about it.

The Spanish used the same procedure in Catalonia just before 1640, resulting in the Catalan revolt. The soldiers were often not alone and accompanied by their wives, children, and sometimes even servants, who needed accommodation. For instance, Juan delli Ponti's regiment, stationed at Kortrijk in 1646, counted 15 companies containing 785 men and 1600 women and children. The book 'De geschiedenis van Kortrijk' [39] mentions that of 7 companies, the exact numbers are known, namely 425 men, 273 women (spouses and widows) and 496 children. Furthermore, the women and children often arrived before the soldiers, as for the regiment mentioned in Kortrijk in 1646. The women and children had arrived one year earlier. The book also describes how the military of a higher rank often rented a home. Not every soldier behaved well during the war, and the local population sometimes suffered from extortion and harassment. We must also repeat that not every soldier in the Spanish army was Spanish. Many Germans, Walloons, Italians, and even Irish and Flemish were there. In his book, Parker describes that the Spanish soldiers from Iberia were better men of honor than the others because, in addition to limited financial reasons, they were soldiers to defend Christianity and often sought noble titles, by which they distinguished themselves from ordinary mercenaries.

Soldiers typically did not stay in the homes of impoverished inhabitants. The rich often paid a fee to the city to prevent the quartering of soldiers in their homes. Sometimes, entire cities paid the Spanish to avoid quartering in their towns. This meant that whole regiments then stayed in the villages outside of the town.

Only a few studies have been conducted on the precise regiments that stayed in Kortrijk in the 17th century. We need more information on tax patents. The book 'De geschiedenis van Kortrijk' mentions the following regiments stationed in Kortrijk:
The tercio of Maestre de campo Marcello del Judici in 1627 (1600 men and women);
Five companies of the corps of Don Adda in 1624;
The Italian tercio of Don Andrea Cantelmo (including 70 women and 150 children);
The regiment, as mentioned above, of Delli Ponti in 1646;
Besides, in 1646, there was also the regiment of Rouveroy (298 men, 400 women, and children), an English infantry regiment (365 men), and even four cavalry companies of Don Castelrodrigo. In 1645, there were the companies of La Housse and Pedro Villamor to protect the town of Kortrijk against a possible French attack.

The book also describes a food shortage in Kortrijk from 1635 to 1626 and the plague (the pest) from 1635 to 1637.

We also found the presence of Irish and other soldiers already in Harelbeke.

It is indeed known that (catholic) Irish soldiers took part in the Spanish army because they found a common enemy in England and the protestant Dutch Republic. Around that period, they were, for instance, involved in the Siege of Breda (1624-1625), just like Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06). Examples are shown in Figures 34.62, 34.63, 34.64, 34.65 and 34.66. There is also clear evidence of Iberian presence in Harelbeke at that time, as shown in Figures 34.67, 34.68, 34.69, and 34.70.

34.5.15 The Role of Carlos Coloma de Saa in the Life of Antoni Desclergue

The military presence in this area can be significantly attributed to Carlos Coloma's influence. Coloma, a prominent military figure, had a substantial impact on Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), the father of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and subsequently recruited Antoni into the Spanish army. Chapter 29.5.2 explains how Coloma and Desclergue were each other's relatives besides their friendship.

Carlos Coloma's biography reveals that he served as the Viceroy of Mallorca from 1611 until 1617. Following this, he was appointed governor of Cambrai, a position he held from 1617 after capturing the city alongside his regiment, including Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05). Coloma maintained his governorship of Cambrai until at least 1632. Despite frequent French attacks over the following decades, Cambrai remained under Spanish control until 1677. In Waregem, a village just east of Deerlijk, church documents indicate the presence of military personnel explicitly linked to Cambrai. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) likely maintained contact with these regiments until 1637, as he had grown up in this region after his father's death.

Carlos Coloma influenced not only the life of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), as detailed in Chapter 29.5.2, but also that of his son, Antoni Desclergue II (DC06). Coloma and Jeroni were contemporaries, serving in Flanders around the same time. Jeroni settled in the Flanders region, where Carlos Coloma's wife, Marguerite van Liedekercke de Gavere, had strong familial ties. Jeroni and Coloma participated in significant military engagements, such as the Siege of Doullens and the Siege of Cambrai, discussed in Chapter 29.5.19. Jeroni returned to Spain with Coloma in 1598 but came back to Flanders in early 1603, only to be killed at the Siege of Ostend in September 1604, leaving his young son, Antoni, behind.

When Carlos Coloma returned to Flanders in 1617 as governor of Cambrai, he recruited Antoni Desclergue (DC06). Antoni had a military career spanning about 22 years, with records in 1641 indicating his ongoing service, as mentioned in Chapter 34.3. His career likely continued beyond this point, as further elaborated in Chapter 34.6. Born around 1601, Antoni would have been approximately 18 years old in 1619, which aligns with the documented timeline. Various sources confirm that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) served under Carlos Coloma in Flanders.

Antoni Desclergue's family ties further illustrate Coloma's influence. His sister, Juana Desclergues (DC06c), born in 1588 at the Spaniard Castle in Ghent, shown in Figure 34.72 and in Chapter 29.9.1, resided there as an adult, probably following her marriage to a Spanish soldier, and passed away in 1622. The connection between the Spaniard Castle in Ghent, Carlos Coloma, and the Kortrijk-Tournai-Cambrai region is underscored by a baptism certificate from Ghent, where Carlos Coloma is recorded as a godfather (Figure 34.73).

Carlos Coloma married the Flemish noblewoman Marguerite van Liedekercke de Gavere. In 1631, he became the commander-in-chief of the Army of Flanders, eventually returning to Spain in 1634.

34.5.16 The Construction of the Chapel at Deerlijk in 1639-1641 and a Possible Involvement in Another One in 1666

We invite readers to delve into Chapter 49, which focuses on the Kapel-ter-Ruste chapel in Deerlijk, followed by a detailed account in Chapter 50 of another chapel's construction in 1666. As explored in Chapter 29.12, on December 18, 1638, the Council of Flanders relieved the city of Harelbeke from its obligation to shelter soldiers. This decision significantly reduced the military pressure on the Kortrijk-Harelbeke-Deerlijk-Waregem region. Although soldiers likely remained in barracks at Overacker in Harelbeke, the city's burden to provide protection was alleviated. This reduction in military presence may have been a compelling reason for Antoni Desclergue (DC06) to leave the area temporarily. During this period, he also supported the construction of a chapel in Deerlijk.

André Woestijn[40] documented the hardships the church and parish of Harelbeke faced prior to the liberation of Ostend in 1604. By 1582, Harelbeke had been ravaged, with priests fleeing and filibusters from Ostend looting the church and stealing documents. The Malcontenten and Spanish forces gradually restored the Catholic faith in the area. The Catholic Canons of Harelbeke likely celebrated the Spanish liberation of Ostend in 1604. Establishing a chapel to honor Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), who died during the final stages of Ostend's liberation in September 1604, would have garnered moral and religious support from the Catholic chapter of Harelbeke. Later, in 1666, a century after Jeroni's (DC05) birth, a chapel was constructed at Saint Louis in Deerlijk, possibly with involvement from Antoni (DC06).

Between 1639 and 1641, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was in Spain, as detailed in Chapter 49. This chapter outlines his involvement in the chapel's construction and connections with the key figures. Some images of Montblanc and the House of Desclergue are presented in Figure 34.74. In contemporary times, the Desclergue family continues to visit Spain for professional reasons, as illustrated in Figure 34.75.

34.5.17 A Donation to the Hospital of Saint-Jean at the Citadel of Cambrai in 1641

When Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) returned from Spain in 1641, he installed items at the Chapel of Deerlijk and donated significantly to the Saint John Hospital of Cambrai. His father, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), had suffered a severe facial injury from an arrow during the Siege of Cambrai in 1596. Following this injury, Jeroni stayed in Cambrai, likely receiving treatment at the Hospital of Saint-Jean. He intended to repay the hospital for their care, but his death in 1604 prevented him from fulfilling this promise. In 1641, Antoni (DC06) honored his father's unfulfilled pledge by donating to the hospital on Jeroni's behalf.

The Société d'Émulation de Cambrai[41] recorded the names of individuals who contributed to the endowment of the Saint-Jean Hospital. On page 541 of this publication, as shown in Figure 34.76, it is documented that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) donated in 1641 on behalf of Jeroni Desclergue (listed in French as 'Jérôme Leclercq').[42] It is important to note that Cambrai remained part of the Spanish Netherlands until 1677, when the forces of Louis XIV captured it. French efforts to seize Cambrai began in 1672, marking the onset of hostilities that eventually led to its annexation.

34.6 Military Career of Antoni Desclergue after 1641

Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), would die in 1651. We find Beatrice active at Deerlijk as a witness to baptisms and weddings between 1640 and her death in 1651. She is also found in the period before her departure to Spain. Antoni Desclergue is absent in the records when he was active as a military in Catalonia to fight the French between 1646 and 1652 when Barcelona was recaptured.

The French renounced Catalonia but kept Roussillon, followed by the Treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659, mentioned in Chapter 8.12.1 and Chapter 34.9. From 1648 onwards, the Peace of Westfalia agreement was signed between Spain and the Northern Netherlands. Consequently, the Spanish could use their military elsewhere.

It is crucial here to mention that Montblanc, where the Desclergues originate from and visited by Antoni Desclergue in the period before 1642, became victim to many troubles in Catalonia, also referred to as 'Guerra dels Segadors' and studied by Manel Güell[43]. Elliot[44] described the period before that.

34.6.1 The Battle of Honnecourt-sur-Escaut (1642)

The historical significance of two pivotal battles, the Battle of Honnecourt (1642) and the Battle of Rocroi (1643), is underscored by their profound impact on the military and political dynamics of the time. Notably, in the aftermath of these confrontations, essential baptisms were recorded at Harelbeke and Deerlijk, indicating the involvement of military personnel from these battles, as detailed in Chapter 34.6.3. It is inferred that Antoni Desclergue (DC06), or his son, participated in these significant engagements.

The French had suffered a significant defeat at the hands of the Spanish Netherlands in the Battle of Leuven in 1635, a critical event described in Chapter 34.5.9. The Battle of Rocroi in 1643 is often viewed as retribution for the loss at Leuven. However, this perspective overlooks the crucial intervening Battle of Honnecourt-sur-Escaut, shown in Figure 34.79. On May 26, 1642, the Battle of Honnecourt occurred, marking a notable encounter during the Thirty Years' War.

The Spanish forces, commanded by Don Francisco de Melo, shown in Figure 34.78, and supported by Baron Jean de Beck, shown in Figure 34.78, had previously captured Lens in 1642 and advanced towards La Bassée. The French, under the leadership of Marshal de Guiche, Henri de Lorraine, comte d'Harcourt, and Antoine III de Gramont, Duc de Gramont, aimed to relieve La Bassée from the Spanish siege. However, de Melo's forces intercepted the French, leading to a decisive battle at Honnecourt-sur-Escaut.

The engagement resulted in a substantial defeat for the French. The well-prepared and strategically positioned Spanish forces outmaneuvered the French, leading to their significant loss. Despite this victory, de Melo made a critical strategic error by hesitating to capitalize on the opportunity to invade and secure a more substantial portion of France. This hesitation allowed the French forces to retreat, reorganize, and rebuild their army.

The subsequent year, the revitalized French army achieved a landmark victory at the Battle of Rocroi on May 19, 1643. This battle is often considered a turning point in the Thirty Years' War. The French decisively defeated the Spanish forces, commanded by the young Duke of Enghien (later known as the Grand Condé). This victory not only avenged the previous defeats but also marked the decline of Spanish military dominance in Europe.

In summary, the Battle of Honnecourt-sur-Escaut (1642) and the Battle of Rocroi (1643) were crucial in shaping the military and political landscape of 17th-century Europe. The French defeat at Honnecourt underscored the need for strategic reform, leading to their eventual triumph at Rocroi, which shifted the balance of power in favor of France.

Understanding the historical context of the battle is essential, particularly as it coincided with the death of King Louis XIII of France. The battle's outcome marked King Louis XIV's first victory, illustrated in Figure 34.78. However, at the time of the battle, Figure 34.101: *Jan Palfijn was born in Kortrijk on November 28, 1650, and died in Ghent on April 21, 1730. He is world-renowned for his invention of the forceps to help deliver children. His father, Gilles, was a surgeon and barber. Jan Palfijn studied human bodies by illegal excavations at the cemetery of Kortrijk. One day, he was caught and fled to Ghent. After three years in the town, he became a master surgeon and moved to Paris to work with Joseph Guichard Duvernay. When he returned to Kortrijk in 1675, he married and was caught again for keeping a human skeleton in his home. That's when he fled to Ypres. After his wife's death, he married Maria du Bois and moved to Ghent again after her death. In 1708, he became a lector at the Surgery School of the town and began to write books. He worked for a while at the hospital Bijloke, where several Desclergue family members had died the century before. A forceps already existed, but Jan Palfijn's model became widely known because he did not keep it secret. That's how he became known as the inventor of this crucial medical device. Louis XIV was only five years old, and the regency was held by Anne of Austria from 1643 until 1651. Louis XIV married Maria Teresa of Spain in 1660 and reigned until he died in 1715.

Following the Battle of Honnecourt, French leadership faced significant challenges. The royal advisor, Cardinal Richelieu, died on December 4, 1642, and King Louis XIII fell ill in early 1643, eventually passing away on May 14. In the spring of 1643, the Spanish army advanced through the Ardennes to invade France to alleviate French pressure on the areas south of Kortrijk. The young French Duc d'Enghien and the experienced Jean de Gassion led a French division of 20000 soldiers from Amiens toward the Spanish forces near Rocroi. Upon arrival, the Spanish, under the command of Francisco de Melo, had already besieged the fortified town of Rocroi. D'Enghien positioned his forces close behind the Spanish, avoiding immediate confrontation. He learned of his king's death on May 17 but withheld this information from his troops. It is essential to note the involvement of Fuentes (Paul Bernard de Fontaine) on the Spanish side, further discussed in Chapter 32 concerning Don Antoni Desclergue y Ratera, brother of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and uncle of Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

Upon hearing of the approach of 6000 additional Spanish troops to reinforce the siege, d'Enghien decided to relieve Rocroi urgently. It prompted de Melo to direct his forces not to Rocroi but against the French. The armies clashed near Rocroi, with the French positioned on a ridge along the Oise River and the Spanish situated between them in Rocroi (Figure 34.80). The initial skirmish on May 18 was light, but on May 19, a full-scale battle erupted. The French adopted horizontal formations, while the Spanish employed traditional tercio formations. The Spanish defeat marked the last use of the tercio formation.

The battle bore significant similarities to the Battle of Austerlitz in 1805, detailed in Chapter 71.7.3.2, where Napoleon's French army triumphed. Napoleon, known for his self-education in military history, likely studied the Battle of Rocroi. Both battles represented turning points in history. D'Enghien demonstrated strategic brilliance, advancing where his troops succeeded and accepting stalemates where necessary. This strategy enabled the French to encircle the Spanish and launch a rear attack, a maneuver known as l'illumination de génie décide du sort de la journée.

German, Italian, and Walloon troops quickly fled, while the Spanish continued to resist under heavy artillery fire until d'Enghien offered them honorable terms to withdraw into Belgium. The Spanish reorganized and defended the border between Belgium and France, preventing further French incursions into the Spanish Netherlands. While 1643 did not yield significant territorial changes, the French successfully countered the Spanish, a positive omen for the young King Louis XIV. Rocroi held symbolic value for France, akin to Austerlitz. De Melo described Rocroi as the most significant defeat for the Spanish in the Low Countries in his letters to the Spanish king. With Louis XIV too young to reign, Anne of Austria, sister to King Philip IV of Spain, acted as regent. After further military successes, the 21-year-old d'Enghien, later known as le Grand Condé, became legendary. The French victory bolstered France's reputation at a politically vulnerable time, shifting the balance of power in Europe from Habsburg Spain to Bourbon France. By the Treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659 (Chapters 8.12.1 and 34.9), Spain was significantly weakened, losing territories like Catalonia and Dunkirk to France.

During the Battle of Rocroi, Fuentes (also known as Fontaines in Belgium and France) was killed. He should not be confused with Pedro Enríquez de Toledo, the Count of Fuentes. The chair used to carry him due to his poor health is displayed at the Musée de l'Armée in the Hôtel des Invalides in Paris. The museum's object description notes: "Le comte de Fuentes (les Français l'appellent Fontaine) malade est conduit en fauteuil sur le champ de bataille. Ce fauteuil est exposé près du tableau de Condé à Rocroi."

Antonio Bermejo Herreros notes that hostilities against the French intensified from 1635 onwards, affecting the coast of Flanders. In 1644, Gravelines became a focal point for the Spanish, while Bergues served as an observation center, troop gathering post, and hospital. In 1646, the Duke of Orleans captured Courtrai and then Bergues, which surrendered on July 29, 1646. The Marquis of Caracena and the Count of Bucquoy's relief efforts were too late. However, Don Gaspar de Bonifacio recaptured Bergues in 1651. The area returned to France in 1677 at the start of the War of Devolution, discussed in Chapter 8.12.

Antoni Desclergue was a sergeant (Sarganto) who witnessed a wedding at the Spaniard Castle in Ghent in 1646 (Figure 34.81). André Woestijn explains that French troops advanced toward the Southern Netherlands after the Spanish defeat at Rocroi in 1643. In October 1643, French forces reached Harelbeke to assault Kortrijk, but Spanish cavalry repelled them. On August 16, 1644, Harelbeke's inhabitants were mustered to defend against the Croats, soldiers of the Duke of Lorraine's army camped at Ardooie. French Marshal Jean de Gassion captured Menin from the Spanish on September 23, 1645, but the Spanish under Marquis de Caracena retook it the same year.

In September 1645, the French threatened Kortrijk again, causing religious nuns from Harelbeke to seek refuge in Kortrijk. On May 1, 1646, the French attacked the Castellany of Kortrijk. By June 13, the Duke of Orleans and Enghien's armies camped in Harelbeke and crossed the Leie, preparing to attack Kortrijk from the cemetery in Kuurne. The Spanish army was split, with forces in Tournai and Boezinge. On June 20, heavy fighting occurred around Harelbeke. D'Orleans surrounded Kortrijk on June 24, and after a four-day siege, the city surrendered. The surrounding areas were devastated.

In February 1647, the French fortified Kortrijk, but the Spanish recaptured it. In 1648, General Becq besieged Kortrijk from Kuurne and Bissegem while the Duke of Lorraine crossed the Leie in Harelbeke, establishing connections and spreading troops. On May 19, 1648, Kortrijk was stormed by Spanish, Walloon, German, and Italian forces, ending 23 months of French occupation. The Spanish held Kortrijk until 1667.

Woestijn found evidence of the dire conditions in Harelbeke in 1648. Despite a safeguard, the farm Harlembois was devastated, and the tenant refused to live there. The military activity had brought Harelbeke to its knees. The Peace of Münster in 1648 ended the Eighty Years War, and the bridge in Harelbeke, destroyed during the war, was repaired in 1652 with city loans.

The scenic area between Namur and Rocroi is defined by the Meuse and Semois Rivers (Figure 34.82). In 1644, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) honored his connections in Ghent by witnessing a wedding of Spaniards (Figure 34.83).

The significance of Rocroi for France is primarily symbolic and an indicator of a turning tide that began under King Louis XIV, which is why French historians at the time often exaggerated its importance. While it is true that France would secure subsequent victories, the Battle of Rocroi was less decisive than French propaganda suggested. An analysis from Historia de la Guerra en la Edad Moderna, based on the literature[45][46], placing the battle in a broader context.

In 1642, a year before the Battle of Rocroi, the forces of the Hispanic Monarchy achieved significant victories at Lens, La Bassée, and the Battle of Honnecourt. Thus, claiming that the tercio system became obsolete just one year after the perceived defeat in 1643 is inconsistent. The Battle of Rocroi resulted in fewer casualties for the French than the Spanish. Yet, Enghien was compelled to withdraw his forces to allow them to recuperate, and he did not launch an offensive against the heart of the Spanish Netherlands in the subsequent months. The immediate consequence was the loss of Thionville, besieged by the French from June 16 and surrendered on August 10, 1643, following a costly siege that reportedly cost the French around 3000 lives.

The French propaganda apparatus seized the opportunity to depict Rocroi as a decisive victory over the Spanish. This narrative bolstered the precarious authority of the regent Queen Anne of Austria and her bold new Cardinal Mazarin. A loss at Rocroi would have had devastating consequences for the regency. Thus, a myth was created, which grew stronger over the ensuing decades and was accepted uncritically by French historians and later adopted in Spain.

Following Rocroi, the Spanish reorganized. The Count of Fuensaldaña's incursions in Boulonnais forced the Duke of Angoulême to withdraw his forces from Flanders. In the north, Dutch attempts to invade the Spanish Netherlands were repelled by Neapolitans Andrea Cantelmo and Francisco Pardo, who defeated the enemy cavalry near Maastricht.

Despite the Prince of Orange's efforts, the Spaniards suffered only one significant defeat on September 4, 1643, when Juan de Borja and Aragon's cavalry were ambushed, resulting in over 600 prisoners. The French were defeated near Tuttlingen on November 24. The combined forces of the Imperial, Spanish, Bavarian, and Duchy of Lorraine armies defeated Marshal Rantzau, capturing him and his generals and losing their artillery. Of Rantzau's 15000 men, only 4,500 escaped.

The losses at Rocroi did not prompt criticism of the tercio system's effectiveness. No contemporary military authority discredited its structure. In December 1643, the Spanish army in Flanders comprised 12992 officers and 64745 infantry and cavalry soldiers, totaling 77,737—a significant number compared to the forces' evolution between 1621 and 1659.

The war between France and Spain continued for 16 more years until 1659. By 1643, many of the war's early protagonists had perished or disappeared from the political scene: Cardinal Richelieu died in December 1642, and Louis XIII in May 1643, shortly before Rocroi. Cardinal Mazarin and Queen Anne of Austria served as regents for the young Louis XIV until 1651. From 1648, France experienced intense internal conflicts between the Monarchy, the Parisian parliament, and the upper nobility, effectively led by Prince de Condé.

The Hispanic Monarchy faced additional challenges in 1647 and 1648, with revolts in Catalonia, Portugal, Naples, and Sicily. The fall of Olivares in 1643, who died in 1645, led to Luis de Haro succeeding him as Philip IV's valid heir. The conflict saw alternating advances and setbacks on all fronts. The Spanish maintained a strong position in Flanders until 1647. In 1646, the French occupied parts of Artois and Hainaut and advanced into Flanders, capturing Dunkirk and Condé. In 1644, Philip IV refocused efforts on Catalonia, recapturing Lleida and defeating La Motte-Houdancourt's army. Subsequent years saw the defeats of two notable French generals, the Earl of Harcourt and the Count himself, at Lleida's ramparts.

During the 1648 Peace of Westphalia negotiations, Mazarin proposed allowing the Rosellon to pass through the Spanish Netherlands, which was rejected. From 1648, France's internal conflicts constrained operations on all fronts until 1653. This diversion of French forces allowed the Spanish to reclaim much territory lost earlier. In the Netherlands, all French conquests reverted to Spanish control except for Arras, Hesdin, and Thionville. In 1652, Spanish armies captured key locations such as Barcelona, ending the Catalan rebellion, and the port of Dunkirk and Casale Monferrato. In 1653, even Rocroi fell back into Spanish hands.

According to historian Juan Luis Sanchez, an expert on the tercio system, "the string of Spanish victories in Flanders between 1647 and 1653 was only surpassed by those of Alejandro Farnesio between 1579 and 1592 and preceded by those of Ambrosio Spinola (1603 to 1607 and 1623 to 1627)."

In 1655, Oliver Cromwell's England entered the conflict, ultimately shifting the balance in favor of France. English forces played a decisive role by blocking American money in Tenerife for several months, which harmed the Spanish economy, and by supporting Marshal Turenne's French army at the Battle of the Dunes in 1658. The Spanish defeat under Juan José of Austria and the Prince of Condé forced Spain to negotiate from a weakened position. The Peace of the Pyrenees was ratified in 1659 on Pheasant Island, limiting French gains to Rosellon, Artois, and a few strongholds in Hainaut and Luxembourg—far less than Richelieu had anticipated in 1635. Historian David Parrott describes the Peace of the Pyrenees as "a commitment reflecting an existing balance of forces rather than a military diktat imposed by the victorious powers."[47]

Thus, while the Battle of Rocroi is celebrated in French historiography as a turning point, its immediate military impact was limited. However, it played a significant role in the broader context of the Franco-Spanish conflict of the 17th century, symbolizing a shift in momentum and contributing to the eventual decline of Spanish hegemony in Europe.

34.6.3 Troops and their Families in the Area Deerlijk-Harelbeke-Kortrijk and their Impact on the Inhabitants during the Lifetime of Antoni Desclergue - after 1641

Before we show evidence, it's important to note that even the priest of Harelbeke in this period was Spanish. Indeed, Francisco Sanchez was the priest from 1646 until March 2, 1662. He was replaced by Petrus Vercruysse (was this perhaps a Pedro de la Cruz ?) in 1662 and died as a priest in Staden on December 9, 1669. Petrus Vercruysse had been a priest in Vichte before he became a priest of Harelbeke. He died as the canon of the chapter (capittel) on February 7, 1712. This can be found in the church registers and is summarized by André Woestijn[48].

We recall that the area was important for several reasons. It was relatively close to the French border. It was located along the Leie River. The site was necessary for the textile industry, using Spanish and English wool and local flax. Troops arrived, and troops left. Some resided in the area after purchasing a property. Others stayed in Barracks located at Overacker along the Beveren Creek, East of the town of Harelbeke. Only when dense troop concentrations appeared was lodging imposed on the city's inhabitants, which they detested. The presence of soldiers is witnessed in church records, such as in Figures 34.84, 34.85, 34.86, 34.87, 34.88, 34.89, 34.90, 34.91, and 34.92.

In Deerlijk, 1642, we found, for instance, a baptism certificate of a certain Jose Pages ('Judocus Page'), son of Pere Pages ('Petrus Page') and Margarete de Voldere. The Godfather was Nicolaus de Smet, and the godmother was Catharina Tumerel ('Tumeriels'). Catherine Tumerel was likely from Douai, perhaps the father too, or he might have even been Spanish because Pere Pages is also a Spanish name from the Gerona area (Catalan).

Tumerel has appeared more than once as godmother at Deerlijk during those years. Therefore, she probably had some importance. The same couple had another son, Rolando, in 1640. There is no further trace of the two children in Deerlijk, so they were not a local family.

In Deerlijk and Waregem, in the 1630s—1640s, the (de) Hamaya family existed, as we have found several baptisms and weddings. However, we are still determining if this is the old version of the common name Ameye. Two families existed then in Deerlijk: a Spanish family, Hamaya, and an indigenous family, Ameye. Because we are not sure, we are not showing the certificates.

Gaspar Portocarrero, shown in Figure 34.87, was probably related to Hernándes Teillo Portocarrero, who was involved in 1597 in the capture of Amiens, together with Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), as was described in Chapter 29.5.24. The involved Petrus Clere, or Pieter Declercq, was Antoni Desclergue's brother-in-law (DC06) and is described in Chapter 35.

There had been problems with French Huguenots in the past, but the issues with France's regular troops began in February 1635, when Louis XIII took the side of the Dutch States and helped to squeeze the Belgians from the South and North flanks.

On September 23, 1645, the French occupied the town of Menin, i.e., the neighboring city of Kortrijk along the Leie in the Southwest. This resulted from a Spanish defeat at Rocroi, explained in Chapter 34.6.2, on May 19, 1643.

Right after the capture of Menin, the French set fire to the town of Kortrijk, and a large portion burned down. Just as during the years when Ostend had been Dutch, the Casselrye of Kortrijk fell victim to plundering, primarily by French troops who sneaked in and occasionally Spanish troops who took advantage of the situation.

As mentioned above, there was a Siege of Kortrijk by the French in the summer of 1646. Delli Ponti was in charge of defending the town of Kortrijk. The assault was launched by the Duque of Orleans and the Duque of Engien, i.e., almost 30000 French soldiers. Antoni Desclergues (DC06) helped to defend the town of Kortrijk as part of the Spanish defense. The Spanish, led by the Duque of Lorraine, shown in Figure 34.78, reached Kortrijk from the West, i.e., from Boezinge near Ypres, to help defend the city. The actual release would then come from the South, i.e., from the area of Tournai. Note that the Duque of Lorraine was then Charles IV, born in Nancy in 1604. The attempt to release Kortrijk from the French Siege came mainly from the South and East, and there have been bitter fights in Deerlijk, Harelbeke, Kuurne, and Heule. Many people from those areas had found security within the walls of Kortrijk. On June 28, 1646, the town of Kortrijk surrendered to Gaston de France, the Duque of Orleans, shown in Figure 34.93.

On July 8, 1646, Louis XIV held a Te Deum in Paris to thank God for the capture of Kortrijk. The citizens of Kortrijk were allowed to keep their possessions and their laws, rules, and privileges.

The war continued around Kortrijk, however. On August 16, 1646, Menin surrendered. Starting in February 1647, the French built a citadel in Kortrijk, where the Gentpoort is located until the border with Harelbeke. Later, the French fortified the city, which considered Kortrijk a defense position in the North and could also be used as a base for further offenses.

Again, ecclesiastic records witness the presence of the military in the area, as shown in Figures 34.94, 34.95, 34.97, 34.98, 34.99, 34.100.

The Spanish, led by General Beck (Baron Jean de Beck), during the reign of Duque Leopold of Austria, tried to take Kortrijk back from the French first in October 1647 and then in February 1648, and then finally, with success, on May 12, 1648. The victory was due to the combined forces of the Spanish, Walloons, Germans, Italians, and Lorraines. The citadel of Kortrijk was able to withstand the Spanish attack but was also defeated on May 25.

Then, the Spanish held a Te Deum at Kortrijk to celebrate their victory.

So, in 1648, the town of Kortrijk became Spanish again, and it was decided to dismantle most of the fortifications in 1654 and 1655 because they appeared useless to the Spanish. Even the road to the town of Kortrijk was restored when arriving via Harelbeke from Ghent's direction.

This is also when the son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), namely Antoni Declerque (DC07), described in Chapter 37, married Martina de la Cruz in Deerlijk.

There was a period of peace then for Kortrijk and its surroundings. The Peace Treaty of Munster ended the hostilities between the Spanish Netherlands and the Dutch States, but there was no such treaty with France. Therefore, there was always a danger of France invading the region again. For this reason, there was continuously a military presence, especially in Winter, in and around Kortrijk, in Figure 34.96, famous for its citizen Jan Palfijn in Figure 34.101.

The Spanish presence is perhaps best seen in Harelbeke, where from 1649 onwards, the priest is Spanish, as found in the book of funerals of Harelbeke, in Figure 34.97.

In this context, we can mention that Carles de Colom (or Carlo de Colombo) led a regiment in the Spanish army during the battle of Rocroi in 1643, in the reserve brigade of Baron de Andre in the artillery of Alvaro de Melo under the general command of Captain-General Don Francisco de Melo. Anna de Colom, shown in Figure 34.100, may have been the daughter of Carles de Colom. On the other hand, there is also a chance that this family belongs to the Coloma family (children of or relatives of Carlos Coloma and Marguerite de Liedekerke).

Note that Anna Tax, who appears in Figure 34.102, was Antonia Taja with Spanish roots. She was sometimes referred to as Anna and sometimes as Tanneke; she was the wife and later also appeared as the widow of Miguel De Vos. She had a daughter Margarita, born in Deerlijk in 1634, a son Jan, born in Deerlijk in 1639, as seen in Figure 49.10 on page 998, a son Antoni, born in Deerlijk in 1641, and a son Guillermo, born in Deerlijk in 1642. Adrianus de Vos was probably a brother of Miguel de Vos and was married to Petronella Vandenbulke.

It s interesting that Pere Declerque (DC07d), a son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), married Florence Vandenbulke at Deerlijk in 1655. The latter may have been a sister of Petronella Vandenbulke. It's indeed characteristic of the 17th century that our family married within a Spanish cluster.

Bucquoy also appears in Figure 34.102. The Conde de Bucquoy led a regiment from Alsace in the Spanish army in the brigade led by the same, in the right-wing division led by Ernst Graf von Isenburg artillery of the Spanish military conducted by Alvaro de Melo under the general command of Captain-General Don Francisco de Melo.

After Antoni's (DC06) return to Deerlijk, the area suffered from the conflict between France and Spain.

More appearances related to the Spanish army are found in Figures 34.104, 34.105, and 34.106.

For clarity, we present the transcript of the baptism in Figure 34.106, at Harelbeke in 1650:

'Die vigesima quinta mensis decembris 1650 ego infrascriptus capellanus hispaniae legionis don Gasparis Bonifacio catechizavi Mariam Joannam (quae baptisata fuit Cortraci die 23a julij anno 1650 filiam don Hieronimi de Benavente Quinones sargenti maioris dictae legionis et d: Anna de Horosquo eius elgitimae coniugis. Fuerunt patrini don Ambrosius de Benavente y Quinones et dona Margareta des Maré loco loco dona Joannae Margaretae de Horosquo. Quibus nota sunt cognatio spiritualis da horunt supra et erat subscriptum Lucas Cavallero.'

In English, this means:

'On August 25 have I, chaplain of the Spanish legion of don Gaspar de Bonifacio, catechized (legalized) the baptism of Maria Joanna de Benavente y Quinones, who was baptized at Kortrijk on July 23, 1650, daughter of don Geronimo de Benavente y Quinones, a sergeant in the mentioned legion, and of Dona Anna de Orozco, his legal wife. The Godfather was Don Ambrosius de Benavente y Quinones, and the godmother was Dona Margareta de Mare, replacing Dona Joana Margareta de Orozco. We note a spiritual link (e.g., Godfather and Godson) between the two men given above, and Lucas Cavallero signed the document.'

The family de Orozco was linked to Martina de la Cruz's family, described in Chapter 37.4, in particular, in Chapter 37.4.2, who married Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) at Deerlijk in 1656. Indeed, Martina's full name was Martina Ximenez de la Cruz, where Ximenez was her grandfather's name and De la Cruz was her grandmother's. Martina's cousin, uncle, or father's cousin (we could not find any closer identification) was Joan Jeroni de la Cruz y Orozco, a captain in the Spanish army who lived until 1677. He married Gracia de Bermudez, the daughter of Luis Cordobes y Hurtado de Mendoza and Maria de Melo Cabral y Martin Lozano.

Indeed, for instance, during the battle of Rocroi, the military section of Gaspar de Bonifacio, clearly present in the area of Deerlijk-Harelbeke-Kortrijk around 1650, belonged to the brigade of Juan Perez de Vivero in the left-wing Tercio division of Francisco de la Cueva, the Duque of Albuquerque in the artillery of Alvaro de Melo of the Spanish Army of Flanders under the command of the Captain-General Don Francisco de Melo.[49]

Alfonso Ceballos-Escalera y Gila (marqués de la Floresta),[50] states that Gaspar de Bonifacio y Godinex was knighted in 1625 as Caballero de Alcantara; he was born in Segovia in 1612 and was General de Artilleria and Sargento General en Flandes.

Whoever knows Sri Lanka knows the de Melo family. This family is less known in Belgium. Dom Francisco de Melo was a Portuguese nobleman and general. He was born in Estremoz, Portugal, and was marquis of the Portuguese Tor de Laguna, count of Assumar, and, from 1641 to 1644, interim governor of the Southern Netherlands.

When Francisco de Melo came to Belgium, he had a political career. From 1632 to 1636, he was the Spanish ambassador to the Republic of Genoa. In 1638, he was appointed Viceroy of Sicily, and two years later, he was ambassador in Vienna. Nevertheless, Francisco de Melo is remembered for the defeat during the battle of Rocroi in 1643, which ex post facto has been regarded as one of the critical steps in the decline of the Spanish empire. Francisco de Melo also had military successes, e.g., in the battle of Honnecourt the year before, described in Chapter 34.6.1, but they have been forgotten.

The peculiar shape of Belgium, particularly the protrusion south of Dinant, often prompts curiosity among Belgians. This seemingly missing piece, which appears like France is encroaching on Belgian territory, can be traced back to the aftermath of the Battle of Rocroi in 1643. As explained above, during this pivotal battle, the Spanish forces suffered a significant defeat at the hands of the French, resulting in territorial losses for the Spanish Empire.

Rocroi, now situated in modern France, lies close to the Belgian border south of Philippeville, a town named in honor of King Philip IV of Spain. It is strategically positioned between the Belgian town of Chimay and the French city of Charleville-Mézières. The Spanish defeat at Rocroi marked the beginning of a shift in territorial control, contributing to shaping the Franco-Belgian border as we know it today.

The Treaty of the Pyrenees, concluded in 1659, concluded the Franco-Spanish War and formalized many territorial changes, including those that impacted the southern border of what is now Belgium.

The area around Rocrois was also where, during WWI, forced laborers from Deerlijk had to work for the Germans, as explained in Chapter 69.9.1.3.

Additional records of interest in this period are found in Figures 34.107, 34.108, 34.110, 34.111, 34.112, 34.113, 34.114, 34.115, 34.116, and 34.117.

A couple of military-related deaths at Kortrijk can be found in 1653, such as Figure 34.118 that lists the following persons:

Maria Plonquet and Philippe Le Bon. We can also see Marie Prolez from Cambrai ('Cameracens'), the wife of Jacobus Delos ('De Laus' or 'Laus'), a soldier in the regiment of Bonifacius. We also find Magdalena O'Seighin ('Sincher'), the wife of William Delaney ('Delual'), a soldier from Ireland.

Also, in Deerlijk, some interesting records can be found in Figures 34.119, 34.120, 34.121,34.122, 34.123,34.124 34.125, 34.126.

Note that the family 'de la Pierre' in Figure 34.119 was linked through marriage (see the work of Coloma) to Adrien Comte de Berlo, who would lead a whole regiment of mercenaries and stay in Deerlijk in 1658, as can be found further down and, for instance, in Figure 34.139. The family was also linked, again through marriage, to the family de Bucquoy.

Although we still need help with the finer details, the current work exposes the links between Desclergue and Maes (de la Maza, Masa, Mas, Masius). For instance, in 1653, a child of de la Maza and Pages was baptized, for which Antonio de la Maza and Anna Declercq were godfathers and godmothers. Antonius Maes has been a student at the Catholic University of Leuven. His matriculation is shown in Figure 34.153 on page 574.

We must mention that between 1654 and 1658, in Deerlijk, much higher than the average number of illegal children were born. One example is shown in Figure 34.127. The baptism certificate states in Latin:

'Baptisata est Maria van Mullem filia Judoci et Catharina Nerinckx ex illigittimo thoro nata hac August 25 1654 cuius susceptores sunt Petrus de Grave Maria de Brabander quod hic proles non sit gravatur(ea?) parochiam de Deerelyck pate(r) constituit se fidei iussorem sicut constat per litteras iuridice confectas per Jacobum le Maiuer consulem Harelbec(ensem?) scriptas ut mihi ipse fassus est. Et mater et proles sunt defunct(ae?). Ergo: nullum periculum quod parochia inde gravebatur,' which roughly translates to,

'Maria Mullem was born, she was an illegal child of Catherine Nerinckx and Judocus Merincks, who had promised to support her financially; Petrus De Grave and Maria de Brabander were godfather and godmother; nevertheless, the child, as well as the mother, have died.'

Guzmán, as seen in Figure 34.128, is linked to the Spanish army.

Indeed, the tercio regiment of Antonio de Velandia Guzmán (a Spanish military) belonged to the brigade of Paul Bernard Conde de Fontaine (see the battle of Rocroi in Chapter 34.6.2), also known as 'Fuentes' [51] in the center division lead by the same, in the artillery of Alvaro de Melo under the general command of Captain-General Don Francisco de Melo. Other interesting examples of 1655 are found in Figures 34.128, 34.129, 34.130, 34.131.

During the Winter of 1656-1657, the regiment of Serralvo, i.e., 736 men, resided in Kortrijk. In 1658, a regiment was initially meant for Dendermonde, but the troops were placed in Kortrijk because Dendermonde paid a lot to the government.

In the Spring of 1657, six English companies of the regiment of Dourmont arrived in Kortrijk to stay for two months. Around the new year 1656-1657, Francesco Romero's garrison came with 800 cavalries in Kortrijk. The period equally offers interesting church records, shown in Figures 34.132, 34.133, 34.134. Soon after, we found more exciting evidence in Figures 34.135, 34.136, 34.137, 34.138, 34.139, 34.140, and 34.141.

At Harelbeke, in 1658, according to the famous book on the genealogy of Carlos Coloma[52], Antoine van Cauteren became provost. He was a relative of Carlos Coloma.

In 1658, the French army of Turenne invaded Flanders again and conquered Dunkirk on June 14, Menin on September 9, and Ypres and Oudenaarde. The villages around Kortrijk, including Deerlijk and Harelbeke, were devastated, and fighters stole their crops. The devastation was caused by the French and the Spanish troops led by Berlo. The soldiers, probably mostly Flemish, Walloon, German, and Italian soldiers, in service of the Spanish in Deerlijk, were there to defend the region, particularly Kortrijk. It is found in books that they did not behave well. Historical records indicate that the conduct of this military was often less than exemplary.

Interestingly, in the book of baptisms of Deerlijk, for the period 1647-1659, the priest wrote on the cover page, in Flemish,

'De 11ste van Augustus 1658, logeerden in Deerlick omtrent vierduyst hurlingen,' and 'op het zelve jaer vlugten gans Berlots ('Barlots') volck ende deinde vier maenden dat wij ferenigt waeren.'

Translated, this means

'On August 11, 1658, around 4000 mercenaries were stationed at Deerlijk' and 'in the same year the entire crowd of Berlo fled and ended the four months that we had been together.'

These were Spanish mercenaries because the French did not rely on mercenaries but only their soldiers. It is known that Berlo led the Spanish army around Kortrijk to resist the French invasion of the area.

In November of 1659, the Treaty of the Pyrenees, explained in Chapter 8.12.1 and Chapter 34.9, was signed, and the French left Flanders again, step by step; Menin turned Spanish back by March 1660.

There was peace again in Kortrijk and the surrounding villages for a few years. However, the military remained because of its location along the Leie River and close to the French border. Evidence is shown in Figures 34.142, 34.143, and 34.144.

Note that in 1657 in Deerlijk, shown further in this book, we found a baptism, in Chapter 37.9.3, of Joana Declercgz (DC08b), daughter of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina Vercruyce / De la Cruz. Godfather was Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), and godmother was Joanna (De) Tila. The latter family is also found in Figure 34.143.

In Chapter 48.3.2, a marriage certificate is also shown of 1670 at Deerlijk, between the Mazza and de Bels family.

A new war began on May 8, 1667, that would take two years and is known as the devolution war, described in Chapter 8.12.1 and Chapter 34.10, between France and Spain, described in Chapter 8.12.1. Indeed, France decided to take the Spanish Netherlands and argued, employing Louis XIV, shown in Figure 34.145, that it had inherited the country. So, Turenne invaded Belgium to fight against Charles II, and because, at that time, the country was not well defended, one city after the other fell into the hands of the French. On July 14, 1667, a new Siege of Kortrijk began, and the town surrendered on July 17. On July 28, 1667, the surrender was signed for Kortrijk and the entire Casselrey.

On May 2, 1668, the Peace Treaty of Aachen ended the hostilities between France and its enemies. However, the conquered territories, including the Castellany of Kortrijk, remained French. In 1672, a war between Holland and France began. The French now used Kortrijk as a base for guerilla attacks on the remaining Spanish territories, which forced the Spanish to counterattack the Castellany of Kortrijk.

The French period for Kortrijk, during which Louis XIV had visited the town twice, lasted until 1678, with the Peace Treaty of Nijmegen, explained in Chapter 34.11. The Treaty gave most of the Castellany back to the Spanish. However, Menen, Bissegem, and Heule would remain French.

While Louis XIV stayed in Kortrijk in May 1673, he primarily resided near the border with Harelbeke, perhaps even on Harelbeke soil. Meanwhile, 46000 French soldiers were stationed around Harelbeke, occupying the flatlands mainly to the town's southwest, south, and southeast.

The Treaty of Nijmegen did not accurately determine which territories would stay French or return to Spain. For this reason, a special commission, namely the Chambre de Réunion, was established in Metz in 1680, but it could not resolve all the disputes.

On September 4, 1683, Harelbeke was occupied by the French, led by the Duque of Boufflers, while Kortrijk remained Spanish. Then Kuurne was taken by Boufflers, and Kortrijk fell under attack. Civil guards mainly defended the town of Kortrijk, but it was fortified, and they had sufficient ammunition. On November 3, 1683, the French army arrived in Harelbeke, led by Marechal d' Humières. Kortrijk surrendered on November 4.

However, the Spanish soldiers in the town did not comply and pulled back into the citadel. They had no other option than to resign on November 6.

The French forces, primarily stationed in Harelbeke, inflicted significant devastation in the ensuing years on any individuals, villages, or towns that resisted their demands. Acts such as burning homes and looting were commonplace. The year 1683, in particular, was marked by widespread destruction and hardship.

Regensburg's Treaty forced the French to leave Kortrijk again on August 16, 1684, and all fortifications had to be removed. Kortrijk became an open city without walls, citadels, or castles. Thus, most of the city's history was demolished, and Kortrijk was transformed from a critical municipality to an unimportant town. The last French troops departed on May 21, 1685.

In the years to follow, the area around Harelbeke formed the stage of warfare again. In the summer of 1689, the French had still to be expelled from the district. Don de Castanaga did this with 20000 Spanish and Dutch troops.

These troops consequently moved south to defend Belgium against the French. In 1690, around 21000 French troops stayed in Harelbeke and occupied the entire area between Kortrijk and Beveren-Leie. In 1694, about 30000 French troops resided just south of Kortrijk.

In the years after, Kortrijk and its surroundings continued to play an essential role in the military.

Figure 34.150: Rocroi. In 1545, Francois I requested Girolamo Marini, commissioner-general of Champagne fortifications, to fortify the Champagne border. He constructed a modest fort near the town of Roulcroix. In 1552, Charles Quint resolved to construct Fort Charlemont at Givet. In response, Henri II ordered the construction of the Rocroi enclosure in the same year, with its radio-concentric plan inscribed in a system of five star-shaped bastions (with orillons). As evidenced by fortification treaties published after 1545, the radio-concentric plan has become the distinctive layout of war towns alongside the polygonal bastioned enclosure. It was finished in 1556. Marini likely constructed the former fort, which has been converted into a bastion known as Bastion du Petit-Fort or Bastion du Roy. Marshal de Bourdillon entrusted the construction to a master mason from Senlis, Loys Lenthe. Initially, there was no enclosure. The Spanish unsuccessfully besieged the city in 1556 and 1559. The administrator of Champagne, Francois de Clèves, ordered the immediate reinforcement of the defenses. Sedan Protestants captured the location on November 20, 1588. It was sold to the Duchess of Guise. In 1614, King Louis XIII purchased it. The initial plan was maintained, but half-moons altered the bastions. As a citadel, a moat separated the King's bastion from the city. Finally, the scarps were concealed with masonry. During the siege of Rocroi by the Spaniards led by Francisco de Melo on May 19, 1643, the famous Battle of Rocroi took place, resulting in a French victory over the Spaniards. The commander-in-chief of the French royal army, the Duke of Enghien, subsequently known as the Grand Condé, demonstrated his military brilliance to all. After a century of defeats and civil conflicts, this decisive victory in the Thirty Years' War (1618–1648) signified France's return to the international stage.

34.7 Antoni Desclergue as Alderman's Clerk

Spanish military personnel stationed in Flanders were not constantly engaged in combat during the Eighty Years' War. While summers were typically reserved for fighting or besieging cities, the winter months necessitated alternative occupations. Antoni Desclergue was a member of an ancient noble family from Spain, distinguished by their long tradition of serving as notaries and scribes—professions denoted by their noble purple blood.

Antoni Desclergue's youth was marked by the challenges of being orphaned at a young age, which likely limited his formal education. Despite this, the notarial profession, deeply rooted in his family heritage, naturally attracted him. This familial legacy of clerical and administrative service probably influenced Antoni's decision to become a griffier (scribe) at the Alderman's bench in Deerlijk. As a scribe, Antoni's duties would have included recording legal documents, maintaining municipal records, and facilitating the administrative functions of the local government. His work in this role is evidenced by his distinct signatures on official documents. Notably, Antoni differentiated his signatures based on the importance of the matters at hand. For routine notarial duties, shown in Figure 34.154, he signed without the "C" of Caballero, his knighthood title. However, for significant personal or official matters, such as documenting the death of his wife Beatrice, he utilized his full knighthood signature, underscoring the gravity and personal significance of those events.

Antoni Desclergue's dual role as a military officer and a civic scribe reflects the broader historical context in which Spanish soldiers in Flanders operated. His ability to navigate these responsibilities highlights the versatility and adaptability required of individuals in such tumultuous times. Desclergue's career also exemplifies how noble lineage and family traditions continued to shape personal and professional identities, even amidst the ongoing conflicts of the Eighty Years' War.

It bears the autograph signature of Leopoldo Guillermo of Habsburg, the Archduke of Austria, and was issued in 1649 in favor of Captain Pedro de Figueroa, replacing the late Gaspar de Baldés. His salary amounted to 135 escudos a month. The document was written in Tournai and was also signed by Augustin Navarro Buzena, who was a Spanish Knight, as can be seen in the anagram he added at the end of his signature, similar to Antoni Desclergue's signature in the same period shown in Figure 34.1 on page 519, and Figure 34.154 on page 575.*

34.8 The Siege of Barcelona in 1651

34.8.1 Antoni Desclergue's Context

It may first be necessary to remind the reader that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was a descendant of the counts of Barcelona, as shown in Figure 34.156 and outlined in Chapter 19.27.2 on page 211, and in Chapter 27.2 on page 301.

It is essential to comprehend the context of this section by recognizing that since 1641, Catalonia, including key areas such as Barcelona, Perpignan, and Roussillon, had fallen under the control of the French Crown. The Spanish Monarchy initiated renewed efforts to reclaim these territories from 1647 onwards. This strategic campaign involved redeploying troops initially from various regions within Spain and subsequently from other Spanish territories, including Flanders. These military maneuvers aimed to reassert Spanish dominance in Catalonia and reverse the territorial losses sustained earlier in the conflict.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) went to Spain with his brothers-in-law Jan Declercq, an archer in the Spanish army, and Pieter Declercq, also in the military. We assume that their wives joined them if they could, i.e., Beatrice Maria Du Puich or Vandeputte of Jan, who would call herself 'Beatriz Maria de Pinto' while in Spain[53]. Beatriz Declercq of Antoni (DC06) could not join them because she passed away early in 1651. The clan left for Barcelona in the summer of 1651, we presume, i.e., after Antoni Desclergue (DC06) had made the necessary arrangements concerning his wife's inheritance for the children.

We have not found more data about Pieter Declercq. Pieter Declercq and Antoni Desclergue (DC06) had been registered as Burgher of Kortrijk but ended this status before leaving for Spain. Indeed, Pieter would never re-establish his condition, while Antoni would re-establish it afterward, as shown in Chapter 34.12.2.

Maria Declerque (DC07b), daughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), joined too. She married in Spain, probably in Valls or in Montblanc, Rafael Juan de Pedrolo, as described in Chapter 28.5.

We know that in 1646, Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) was already a sergeant. He must have further climbed the military echelons to take an essential role in the Siege of Barcelona in 1651. As mentioned, in 1651, he did not register as a Bourgeois Forain at Kortrijk; his wife died in early 1651, and he left for Spain in the summer of 1651. It is interesting to note that it took Antoni Desclergue, the son of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05), who had passed away in 1604, nearly six months to arrange his wife's inheritance in 1651, which may be due to his activity to recruit soldiers for Spain.

Antoni's brother-in-law Jan Declercq, from the family of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) and Antoni's stepbrother Jan Declercq (DK03dya), served as guardians for the underaged children concerning the inheritance. Indeed, as can be in Chapter 34.12.3, on July 17, 1651, both Jans were appointed as guardians to the children. After the Siege, Jan Declercq remained in the army described in Chapter 36.4. We don't know what happened to Pieter Declercq.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06) took another person with him from Deerlijk, namely Joost Desaux, who would be called 'Jose Dausach' in Spain, very likely with his family, including his sister or an adult daughter, Catherine Desaux (Catarina Dausach). After returning from Spain, Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) served as godfather in 1652, at Deerlijk, to the daughter of Jose Dausach, in Figure 34.159.

We know that Antoni did not marry again but would have an affair with Catarina Dausach or Catherine Desaux. The latter returned to Spain in the winter of 1653-1654 or Spring of 1654, perhaps with Antoni (DC06), and had a daughter 'Maria Catarina Dausach' (sic), baptized on July 26, 1654 (at Sant Pere de Rubi, near Barcelona), in Figure 34.158. Maybe the couple traveled back and forth during that period. We do not know if Antoni (DC06) was there too at that time; perhaps not. The daughter received the name of the already passed away eldest daughter of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), namely Maria, followed by the first name and the mother's family name.

We found no further records of this daughter, Maria Catarina Dausach. Perhaps she did not live long. However, we know that when Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz had a daughter in 1669, her name would be Maria Catarina. She was named after her (dead) auntie.

On the Spanish baptism certificate of Maria Catarina Dausach, Antoni Desclergue is mentioned as 'Antoni de Jeroni' (sic).

That the Desclergues were connected to the Dausach clan is also shown in Figure 29.171 on page 435, where a daughter of Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), described in Chapter 29.9.6, gives birth to a daughter, Maria Anne Legier in Cambrai in 1650, with Ares Dausach as godfather.

In 1656, in Deerlijk, Antoni (DC06) was present for the wedding of his son Antoni (DC07) with Martina de la Cruz, described in Chapter 37.5. We also know that he appeared as Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk from 1652 onwards. Therefore, if he had left again for Spain, it would not have been for several years.

Note that from 1652 onwards, there were more baptisms of the Dausach-Velghe family in Deerlijk (Catharina on June 18, 1658, Arnoldus on March 4, 1657, Joanna on July 28, 1655, Agidius on November 9, 1653, Maria on March 5, 1652, Ludovicus on December 5, 1649, Michael on February 19, 1648).

It is possible that Maria Catarina Dausach returned with her mother to Belgium. Perhaps Antoni and Catherine even married afterward. We have no evidence. There is a wedding in Figure 34.160 on October 14, 1679, in Brussels at 'Saint Michel et Gedule,' which may be of Maria Catarina. The witness was 'J Declercg' and may have been Joana Declercgz (DC08b), her niece, who was 22 years old. Her father, Antoni (DC06), was still alive but was an older man of 77 years who perhaps could not travel to Brussels. While these scenarios are plausible, conclusive evidence remains elusive.

Before we move on to the next topic, it's exciting to read again the baptism certificate of July 26, 1654, at Sant Pere de Rubi near Barcelona, in Figure 34.158. The baptism certificate from Rubi was obtained with the help of Mormons in France at Villeneuve d' Ascq and Loos at the border with Haubourdin[54]. Note that, as a coincidence, this village also appears in the history of the Chapel of Deerlijk as described in Chapter 49.

The certificate reads,

'Als Vint y Sej de juliol 1654, fou bateyada una filla de Antoni de Jeroni y de Catarina Maria Dausach per Afonso.. vicary de rubi villat de Barcelona foren padrinij Pere Pau Pi de dita parroquiae y Maria Barcelo, posaran el nom Maria Caterina di la babejada.'

In English, it says that,

'at San Pere e Rubi near Barcelona, on July 6, 1654, a daughter of Antoni de Jeroni en of Catharina Mana Dausach was baptized. Alfonso, the vicar of Rubi in the county of Barcelona, did the baptism. The godparents were from the parish and were Pere Pau Pi and Maria Barcelo. The child was Maria Catharina, called 'Babejada,' which means 'the little drooler'.'

We found that the godmother, Maria Barcelo, had married Joan Llados y Ameller in San Pedro, Rubi, near Barcelona, on February

She appears one time as Catharina Desclergue in a document in 1576 (Montblanc) in which it would have been harmful to reveal her true identity being a Cortés. The same document also hides the ancestry before Pere Desclergue, although it mentions that Pere Desclergue was important and respected and was buried in the Monastery of Montblanc ... which means that his ancestry cannot have been unknown. In 1599, the family again used its full name, i.e. Desclergue i Cortés, as the political landscape in 1599 permitted it. Because she was of higher nobility than the rest of the ancestry tree, her descendants would proudly want to be referred to as Desclergue y Cortés.

Her godfather was Pere Pau from Rubi, and her godmother was Maria Barcelo, the daughter of H. Barcelo and Elaria Llados y Ameller from Tarrasa. The godparents were unrelated to the mother.*

26, 1648; she was the daughter of H. Barcelo and Elaria. Her husband was the son of Joan Llados y Ameller and Anna. We also found a Pere Pau Pi who married Ygnes Baneta at San Pedro, Rubi, Barcelona, on January 3, 1668. We have found no trace of Catarina Maria Dasauch and also not of her daughter Maria Catarina.

Before 1700, we only found two Dassauch couples within a reasonable area around Barcelona. Perhaps one of these is the parents of Catarina Maria. We saw Joan Dausach and Margarida at Gerona, who had children in the 1620s (Pere Joseph, e.g.), and we also found Ramon Dausach and Eleanor Paset. They married at Tarrasa in Barcelona on May 19, 1619.

The surname Dausach is notably rare. The name probably derives from 'Da Usach.' While 'Usach' does exist, it is equally uncommon.

34.8.2 Antoni Desclergue's Involvement in the Siege of Barcelona

Before the Siege of Barcelona, numerous episodes in the re-conquest of Catalonia were characterized by significant conflict and hardship. While there are no specific indications that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was involved in these early stages, it is vital to understand the broader military and political landscape leading up to the siege.

Manel Güell[55] recounts a dramatic episode where the Santa Maria Church of Montblanc was nearly destroyed in August 1649. Prominent figures such as Juan de Garay, Francisco de Melo, the Marquis de Mortara, the Duke of Albuquerque, Gaspar de la Cueva, Juan de Sossa, Alonso de Mercado, and many others played crucial roles during these turbulent times.

The Siege of Barcelona, which took place from July 1651 until October 1652, was a pivotal event in the Catalan Revolt (1640-1652). The revolt was part of the larger struggle against the centralizing policies of the Spanish Monarchy under Philip IV and his prime minister, the Count-Duke of Olivares. With its distinct political traditions and economic interests, Catalonia resisted these policies, leading to a decade-long conflict.

The siege was orchestrated by a substantial Spanish army that descended on Barcelona, besieging the city held by a garrison of Catalan and French troops under the command of Philippe de La Mothe-Houdancourt. This prolonged and arduous siege, depicted in Figure 34.161, lasted 15 months and culminated in a decisive Spanish victory, effectively ending the Catalan Revolt.

The fall of Barcelona suppressed the revolt and reasserted Spanish control over Catalonia. However, French troops remained in Catalonia for another seven years, maintaining a precarious ceasefire until the Treaty of the Pyrenees in 1659, which concluded the conflict and resulted in the cession of northern Catalonia, including Roussillon, to France.

Antoni Desclergue (DC06), a man of nearly 50 years at the onset of the siege, may not have participated as a traditional soldier due to his age. However, his role in the siege was significant. It is plausible that he served in a senior staff role, such as a colonel or a mayor, though below the rank of maestro de campo. His involvement in the siege can be inferred from the military compositions and movements documented during this period.

An analysis of the army's composition is essential to estimate Desclergue's position during the siege better. According to George Payne Rainsford James,[56] the Spanish besieging force included a Flemish regiment, suggesting the presence of troops from various Habsburg territories.

In July 1651, Baron de Seebach led an army comprising 6000 men, 2,600 horses, 16 guns, and four artillery pieces from Lleida to Cervera to threaten Balaguer. The Marquis de Mortara's records indicate that this force grew to 5760 men, 2300 horses, 22 artillery pieces, 250 chariots, and 400 mules. This army later joined another force transported by sea, which disembarked on August 8 and included 2,500 German soldiers and additional artillery.

The Siege of Barcelona was a significant military endeavor involving extensive logistics and coordination. The presence of a Flemish regiment within the Spanish forces, along with the later addition of German soldiers, underscores the multinational nature of Habsburg military operations. Antoni Desclergue's role, while not explicitly documented in the early stages, would have been crucial in the later stages, contributing to the administrative and logistical efforts required for such a protracted siege.

The army that besieged Barcelona was composed of up to 24 tercios or regiments:

Spanish tercios:
- Gaspar de la Cueva
- Juan del Castillo with a battery of 7 pieces 1 of 26 pounds the rest of 30, 40 and 46 pounds.
- Luis de Torres
- Pedro Estevan (Aragonese of 10 companies)
- Francisco de Sada (Aragonese of 10 companies)

Irish Tercios:
- Count of Tirón
- Cristobal Obreni (O' Brien)

Italian Tercios:
- Tiberio Carraffa
- Marco Antonio de Genaro
- Marquess of Grez

Walloon Tercios:

- Calone
- Francisco Franquè

German regiments:
- Iaques
- Cleinhans

- Troç of Burgundy - Dionisio Poitier 600 men
- Troç of Flanders - Julio Vizconde (Comissario General) 600 men[57]

- Tercio of Cristobal Cavallero
- Tercio of Pedro Viedma - (he Trinidad Fort)

German Regiment of Baron de Vilani - (Fort of Our Lady of Montserrat)
- Tercio of Valencia (387 men effectively in August of 1652)
- Tercio of the Count of Ro - (To the Fort Viscount and Our Lady of Grace)
- Careme's German Regiment - a Star (not a fort)
- Tercio of Walloons of Franqueè - (the fort of San Buenaventura)
- German Regiment of Chapuis - (Within two redoubts next to the Quarter of Sans)

In December, 1100 men arrived from Martin de Azlor's Aragonese tercio. On December 21, 1651, Pedro de Viedma's tercio arrived with 300 men. On December 28, a company of 90 men of the tercio of Valencia and 160 men of the cam of Juan de Miranda. On December 31, 1651, the tercio from Tarragona arrived with 900 men in 10 companies. Engaged with this was a company of 110 men from the Aran Valley. Antoni Desclergue (DC06) likely played a senior role in the Flemish regiment 'Troç de Flandes led by Julio Vizconde.' The composition, as mentioned above, of the army on the side of the Spanish Monarchy can also be found in Bremundan's book[58], shown in Figure 34.162.

34.8.3 Antoni Desclergue's Life After the Siege of Barcelona

Following the Siege of Barcelona, one might have anticipated that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) would transition to a more peaceful life. However, the region around Kortrijk remained tumultuous. The period from 1658 to 1659 is notably called the Berlot era. Despite the signing of the Peace of Münster on May 15, 1648, King Louis XIV of France continued hostilities against the Spanish. During these conflicts, Harelbeke endured significant hardships. Unlike previous periods, the scale of billeting increased substantially, with extensive military contingents occupying the town for extended durations.

In the spring of 1658, the French army, under the command of Marshal Turenne, once again invaded Flanders. Both Spanish and French forces devastated the local agriculture, turning the area into a no-man's land frequented by vagrants and soldiers who harassed and plundered the populace.

On May 22, 1658, the Castellany of Kortrijk was authorized to establish guards in all its parishes to protect against these threats. That same year, the Kortrijk garrison under Baron de Berlot served the Spanish crown, pillaged Harelbeke, stealing clothing, fruits, livestock, and other valuables and setting several houses ablaze. Despite these depredations, residents were still required to supply provisions to the occupying armies.

The logistical needs of an active army precluded barracks, necessitating soldiers' forced billeting in private homes. From May 28 to June 30, 1659, Harelbeke hosted Count Merchy's troops in Spanish service for 33 days and nights. These troops could have conducted themselves better, and numerous houses were demolished during their stay.

André Woestijn[59] documented specific instances of this billeting.

For example, a captain and his retinue were lodged with the brewer Arent Lemayeur, while the company of Count de Merchy's son stayed with Simoen Staes at De Swaene, among others. The supply roll indicates that approximately 4300 men and 50 horses were billeted in the area. On June 30, 1659, new cavalry and infantry regiments arrived, further straining local resources.

Records from the Kortrijk archives confirm that soldiers were quartered in Zwevegem during 1659-1661.[60]

On November 7, 1659, France and Spain signed an armistice, followed by the Treaty of the Pyrenees, as detailed in Chapter 8.12.1 and Chapter 34.9. This treaty led to the withdrawal of French forces from the region, temporarily restoring Kortrijk to Spanish control. However, this peace was short-lived, as hostilities resumed in 1666.

34.9 Tratado de los Pirineos - Visit of Antoni to Montblanc in 1659

In 1659, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) undertook a significant journey from Kortrijk in Flanders to Montblanc near Tarragona in Spain. This period was marked by the conclusion of the Reapers' War and the signing of the Treaty of the Pyrenees, events that are detailed in Chapter 8.12.1 and illustrated in Figure 34.163.

The Treaty of the Pyrenees, signed on November 7, 1659, between France and Spain, effectively ended the Franco-Spanish War (1635–1659), bringing considerable geopolitical shifts. The treaty resulted in territorial concessions, with Spain ceding parts of Catalonia, including Roussillon, to France, thereby altering the balance of power in the region.

Antoni Desclergue's return to Spain in 1659 was not just a geographical journey, but a personal one. It was a time for him to reconnect with his family in Montblanc, including his daughter, Maria Declercque (DC07b), and her husband, Rafael Juan de Pedrolo.

Historical records indicate that Antoni Desclergue was absent from his duties as Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk during 1659 and 1660, as mentioned in Chapter 34.12.2.

While in Montblanc, Desclergue probably played a significant role in familial and local community events. Notably, he is believed to have served as the godfather to Antoni de Pedrolo, the son of Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue and Anna Maria Ratera Riber and Robuster. This child was baptized on November 20, 1659.[61]

Desclergue's journey from Flanders to Catalonia during this period was not just a physical distance, but a testament to the interconnectedness of European regions, even amidst ongoing conflicts. The journey itself would have been a daunting task, involving traversing territories still recovering from years of warfare. However, the cessation of major hostilities following the Treaty of the Pyrenees likely facilitated safer passage for individuals, highlighting the tangible impact of this historical event on individual lives.

The Treaty of the Pyrenees had far-reaching implications. It marked the end of the Franco-Spanish War and symbolized the decline of Spanish hegemony and the rise of French power under Louis XIV. The treaty included marriage arrangements between the French and Spanish royal families to secure long-term peace between the two nations.

34.10.1 Antoni Desclergue as a Military Recruiter for the Devolution War (1667-1669)

There are indications in the Bourgeois Forain registers of Kortrijk that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was significantly affected by the Devolution War, as detailed in Chapter 8.12.1. Notably, his name does not appear in the records for 1668 and 1669.

The Devolution War (1667-1668) was a conflict initiated by France under King Louis XIV, who claimed the Spanish Netherlands (modern-day Belgium) on behalf of his wife, Maria Theresa of Spain, based on the law of devolution, which argued that these territories should devolve to her upon the death of her father, Philip IV of Spain. The war resulted in significant territorial gains for France, confirmed by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1668.

In the face of renewed hostilities, the Spanish Monarchy launched a strategic and extensive recruitment campaign. Commencing in the fall of 1667, new soldiers were enlisted in Spain to bolster the forces against France. Recruiters, including the notable Antoni Desclergue (DC06), were dispatched from Flanders to Spain. Their mission: to enlist men for the Ejercito de Flandes (Army of Flanders). This recruitment effort was not just a necessity, but a crucial strategy to maintain Spanish defenses and counter French advances during the war.

Such recruitments in Asturias for instance, are described by Antonio José Rodríguez Hernández[62]. His article explains that the recruitment occurred during winter to ensure the new troops arrived in Flanders by the beginning of Spring 1668, ready for the campaign against France. From Asturias alone, around 400 Spanish soldiers were sent to Flanders between 1668 and 1672.

To show that such recruitments took place everywhere in Spain, by incorporation of the nobility, we may also cite Antonio José Rodríguez Hernández[63]:

'A finales de 1667 se pidió a distintos nobles y prelados eclesiásticos que sirviesen a la corona reclutando a su costa algunas compañías. La idea de esta petición a los grandes poseedores de jurisdicciones sobre importantes territorios era el intentó de establecer 'una leva universal en todas partes' para poder asistir lo más brevemente posible al gran apuro que había supuesto la invasión francesa de los Países Bajos en mayo de 1667. La guerra había pillado por sor- presa a gran parte del alto mando hispano que aun se lamentaba de la imposibilidad que suponía para la Monarquía Universal su incapacidad de someter al país vecino y el poco fruto que se había tenido con todas las campañas emprendidas para ello. La corona ese año había calculado que necesitaba movilizar para reforzar los ejércitos de Flandes, Milán y Cataluña, alrededor de 20.000 hombres en la península, por lo que las vías normales de reclutamiento apenas podrían llegar a cumplir con una cuarta parte de las necesidades. Ante estas expectativas la corona pretendía intensificar el reclutamiento de todas las formas posibles, creyendo que la nobleza y el clero podrían ayudar a conseguirlo. No se pedía que los nobles a la cabeza de sus vasallos salieran a combatir a cualquiera de los frentes, sino que ejercieran una función de reclutadores de hombres en sus propios estados para que algunos de sus vasallos se alistasen en los ejércitos convencidos por sus señores.'

34.10.2 French King Louis XIV and Spanish Maria Theresia of Austria

In this book, we do not delve deeply into the remarkable figure of French King Louis XIV, le Roi-Soleil, whose tomb is illustrated in Figure 34.165. For a comprehensive understanding of his transformative impact on France, we invite readers to consult existing literature on his reign.

On June 9, 1660, Louis XIV married Maria Theresia of Austria, the daughter of Spanish King Felipe IV, depicted in Figure 34.164. Maria Theresia renounced her claim to any Spanish inheritance to prevent a conflict of interest. In exchange, Spain was obliged to pay a substantial dowry to the French king. However, Spain failed to fulfill this obligation, leading Louis XIV to assert his right to the Spanish Netherlands through his wife's claim.

To counter this potential claim, Felipe IV remarried and fathered a son shortly before his death. According to Spanish law, this son was the legitimate heir to the entire inheritance, bypassing the elder sister. In contrast, under French and Belgian law, the inheritance would be divided among all children, thereby sustaining Louis XIV's claim to the Spanish Netherlands. Following Felipe IV's death, tensions escalated. On May 7, 1667, Louis XIV declared war on Spain, and two weeks later, he invaded the Spanish Netherlands. The Dutch Republic, aligned with England, Scotland, and Sweden, intervened to assist Belgium and repelled the French forces. They preferred maintaining Belgium as a buffer state rather than having France as a direct neighbor.

On May 8, 1667, Louis XIV also declared war on Charles II of Spain. Historian André Woestijn[64] discovered evidence of this period in Harelbeke. In 1667, the town hosted military lodgings, including a company called 'La Verge Rouge.' Captain Wain's company, assigned to the city for six weeks, was subsequently bailed out.

On July 13, 1667, the French commander d'Aumont attacked Kortrijk, forcing the Spanish to retreat towards Harelbeke and Deerlijk due to insufficient resistance. The Spanish then regrouped and retreated to the fortress of Ghent. The impact on the Desclergues family is detailed in Chapter 34.10.3. The French Marquis de Villequier captured the bridge over the Leie River at Harelbeke with 600 cavalrymen, reinforcing it to facilitate the siege of Kortrijk. Marquis de Bellefroid later assumed control of Harelbeke.

A significant event occurred on August 29, 1667, when Louis XIV himself visited Kortrijk, attended a Te Deum at the local church, and spent the night at the Harelbeke army camp, previously used by the Spanish, near Overacker along the Beveren Creek (explored in Chapter 29.12 and Chapter 29.12.2). From Harelbeke, Louis XIV advanced towards Deinze.

The Peace of Aachen, signed on May 2, 1668, granted Louis XIV control over the conquered regions of Flanders and Hainaut, including the Castellany of Kortrijk. Fireworks were set off in Harelbeke to celebrate the peace. In May 1668, France partially withdrew from the Netherlands and entirely from Franche-Comté. The regions of Sint-Winoksbergen, Veurne, Menen, Ath, Oudenaarde, Binche, Charleroi, Kortrijk, and Tournai remained under French control for a period. Additionally, French-speaking areas in the Spanish Netherlands, such as Lille, Armentières, and Douai, also remained French.

André Woestijn describes how, under French rule, the demands on local resources continued unabated. On February 20, 1669, the Castellany of Kortrijk was required to supply 500 rations of forage (comprising one bundle of hay and one bundle of straw each) and 500 rations of oats for the French cavalry stationed in Kortrijk. Harelbeke's contribution was set at two daily quotas, to be delivered to Remaut at the Pottelberg warehouse, with severe penalties for non-compliance. Kortrijk remained a French stronghold until the Peace of Nijmegen in 1679, as detailed in Chapter 34.11. During this period, Harelbeke and Deerlijk shared Kortrijk's fate, being part of the same Castellany. This conclusion is further supported by records of Bourgeois Forains residing in Deerlijk during that era.

34.10.3 Residence at Ghent

We believe that this episode in the life of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) impacted the early history of a chapel in Deerlijk, referred to as Saint Louis, described in Chapter 50.

France initiated a war against the Dutch Republic in May 1672, known as the Franco-Dutch War. This conflict primarily focused on the eastern regions, sparing Flanders from direct hostilities. However, the war's implications reached far and wide, affecting various territories and prompting significant strategic shifts.

Upon his return from Spain, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) initially settled in Deerlijk. However, after a few years, he relocated with his family to Ghent, recognizing its importance as Flanders' economic and military stronghold. Given its fortified position and resources, Ghent was strategically vital for repelling French advances.

As the Franco-Dutch War progressed, alliances began to shift. Despite their historical enmity, the Dutch Republic and Spain found a common cause against the burgeoning power of France. By 1672, the Dutch were on the verge of allying with Spain to counteract French aggression. This coalition aimed to reclaim territories and curtail French dominance.

Antoni Desclergue's move to Ghent was timely, as this city became a focal point for organizing and launching counterattacks against French forces. The anticipation of Dutch support bolstered the defensive efforts in Flanders, providing a glimmer of hope for those resisting French expansion.

The Franco-Dutch War marked a period of complex political maneuvering, where former adversaries united against a common threat. The Dutch-Spanish cooperation symbolized a significant geopolitical shift, impacting the strategies and movements of individuals like Antoni Desclergue, who sought refuge and opportunity within Ghent's protective embrace.

We have found traces of the Desclergues in Ghent during this period, such as shown in Figure 37.97 on page 664, or Chapter 37.98 on page 664. They resided at the parish of Saint Bavo, within walking distance from the Spaniard Castle. Numerous appearances of the Desclergues are shown in this book in earlier times, such as, for instance, Figure 34.83 on page 554, which means that they were familiar with the Spaniard Castle and also Saint Bavo's parish.

The French capture of Ghent in 1678 was critical in the lives of the Desclergues because they resided at Ghent then. We focus on this episode in Antoni's son Antoni Desclergue (DC07) description in Chapter 37.6.

The Descendants of the Desclergues took the side of the Spanish and could no longer reside in the French-held area, which is how they ended up in Ghent.

In Chapter 37.6, describing the life of Antoni's (DC06) son Antoni Declerque (DC07), we show church records at the Spaniard castle, which expose their presence there. We also describe in more detail the capture of Ghent by the French.

Interestingly, there is proof that the two branches of the descendants of the Desclergues of Montblanc appeared together in Ghent at that time. It shows that the families probably remained in contact, although not always visible in the records, and showed up on a church certificate together on the occasion of a wedding at the Spaniard castle in 1674.

When Ghent was defeated and occupied by the French in 1678, the Desclergues returned to Deerlijk either immediately or just after the Treaty of Nymeghen, as is witnessed by the registrations of the Bourgeois Forains of Kortrijk.

The Peace Treaty of Nymegen of September 17, 1678, turned the Chastelany of Kortrijk back to the Spanish. In April 1678, for instance, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) still appeared as a witness at a wedding at Ghent Sint Pieters of a soldier Joannes Tibau and of Clara Le Leroy, as shown in Figure 37.98 on page 664 in Chapter 37.6.

34.10.4 Other indications of Regional Instability

The instability or transitional state of the region during that period is corroborated by a compelling annotation found in the parish registers of Wakken, situated along the Leie River adjacent to Wielsbeke, Sint Baafs Vijve, and across from Sint Eloois Vijve. For a particular duration, no baptisms or marriages were recorded in the parish, a hiatus attributed to force majeure. The pastor eloquently summarized the situation with the phrase "under duress." This specific note is documented in a figure, referred to as 34.166, within a 1745 transcription of the baptismal records at Wakken, dating back to 1671.

34.11 A Visit to Spain in 1679 for a Wedding after the Peace of Nijmegen

At the age of 77, Antoni served as a marriage broker to his Godchild Antoni de Pedrolo, son of Francesc Jacinto de Pedrolo y Desclergue, described in Chapter 28.5.9, and Maria Anna De Vos, in 1679. The wedding took place in Blanes, Gerona. Interestingly, Antoni does not appear in documents at that time in Flanders, equally not as Burgher (Bourgeois Forain, absent in 1679 and 1680). This year is not a coincidence and should be viewed in the light of the Treaties of Nijmegen, explained in Chapter 34.11, and shown in Figure 34.167, which ended, again, the wars between France and the Spanish Netherlands and also France and Spain and Spain and the Northern Netherlands. Indeed, on August 10, 1678, France and the Dutch Republic made peace. On September 19, 1678, France and Spain (under H.M. King Carlos II) made peace.

In 1679, peace was also established with Sweden and the Holy Roman Empire. In 1679, Antoni Desclergues (DC06) was able to convince H.M. King Carlos II of Spain, shown in Figure 34.167, to grant a hereditary noble title to Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue, father of Antoni de Pedrolo. Antoni de Pedrolo was located at Gerona for his wedding because he was involved in the military then, as described by Santiago Alberti.[65]

34.12 Antoni Desclergue's Marriage and Whereabouts

Our extensive account reveals the remarkable journey of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), who, in 1619, stepped into the shoes of Carlos Coloma, serving as a Spanish soldier in Flanders. His unwavering dedication saw him remain in the Spanish army for an impressive 22 years until his mention in a book in 1641. It is believed that he continued his service, albeit in more administrative capacities, a testament to his commitment and loyalty.

He married early, around 1620 when he was in Cambrai. He had three children with his first wife, namely Anna Declerque (DC07e), in Chapter 36.3, Juan Declerque (DC07c), in Chapter 36.4, and Michiel Declerque (DC07f) in Chapter 36.8.

His wife died soon, and Antoni remarried before 1628 Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) from his stepfather's Declercq clan of Kortrijk, described in Chapter 34.13, with whom he had four more children, namely Antoni Declerque (DC07), in Chapter 36.2, Maria Declerque (DC07b), in Chapter 36.5, Joan Declerque (DC07g), in Chapter 36.6, and Pere Declerque (DC07d), in Chapter 36.7.

In 1639, he went to Catalonia with his family for the war between Spain and France. He returned but would go back to Spain several times.

It is exciting to compare his presence on the lists of Bourgeous Forains in Chapter 34.12.2 of Kortrijk with his military career. He remained absent on the list when he was in Spain. Also, they cannot be found on the list during the family's stay in Ghent.

Although we have no evidence that Antoni lived in Wingene, he must have visited it because it was located in the North of the Castellany of Kortrijk, close to Flanders' Northern defense line. A trace is found in Figure 34.168 in 1629.

34.12.1 Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), Antoni Desclergue's (II) (DC06) wife

Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), our ancestor, was the daughter of Natalis Declercq (DK02by) (known as 'Noel Declercq'), the son of Oste Declercq (DK02b). Oste was the son of Nicolas Declercq (DK01) and the grandson of Jan Declercq (DK00).
They were members of the Declercq clan from Kortrijk, described in Chapter 34.13, just like Jan Declercq (DK03), described in Chapter 34.13.7. More information about Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), her ancestry, and her connection to Jan Declercq, Beatrice's stepfather-in-law, is given in that Chapter 34.13.

To understand this chapter, it's interesting first to read Chapter 29.11. Jan Declercq (DK03), a prominent citizen in Kortrijk, was Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) stepfather, while Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés was his natural father. They were both 'Jan.' Nevertheless, it's through Jan Declercq (DK03) that Antoni Desclergue received bourgeoisie rights and other local privileges.
Furthermore, the Bourgeoisie list in Kortrijk has no entries that specifically fixed a stepfather or stepson. Stepchildren could become Bourgeois Forain, but Kortrijk, unlike other cities, did not make the distinction.[66][67] The designation was 'f' 9', which could stand for filium or filiastrum, i.e., son or stepson. The other possible entries in Kortrijk were: 'fa', which stood for filia or filiastra (daughter or stepdaughter), or 'Wa', which stood for Vidua or widow. It was much more difficult for Spaniards to obtain bourgeoisie rights, often only possible through marriage.
So, Jan Declercq (DK03) opened the door for them. Hence one can see, for instance, 'Antoni Desclergue (DC06), (step)son of Jan Declercq (DK03)' in the list, or literally: 'Anthone Le Clercq fili(astr)um Jans.' The (step)father / (step)son relationship gave them access to local privileges easily. However, it was not automatically inherited but typically arranged when they became somewhat independent, i.e., when they reached 25 or married.[68]
With his descendants, Jan Declercq (DK03) is described in Chapter 34.13.7.
Apart from the Salamanca principles of Ius inter gentes, we can also refer to other generally applicable work. Marco Ferro[69] wrote that,
'adoption by marriage, when the husband's or wife's children from a previous marriage were accepted as legitimate and natural children, not stepchildren, were admitted to inheritance with the same rights and on the same footing as children from the current marriage.' Although the exact laws did not apply in Deerlijk, the marriage contract between Jan Declercq (DK03) and Felipa de

[66] According to professional genealogist Jan Caluwaerts, a distinction was sometimes made in Kortrijk in later times, i.e. after 1680, and in that period one also sometimes made a distinction between children of first or second marriage.

[67] As a matter of fact, there are many genealogies based on lists of Bourgeois Forrains. One must be very careful because often, stepchildren are taken for biological children. Therefore, these genealogies are wrong, except when backed up by other evidence.

[68] Jan Declercq (DK03) is often confused with Jan Declercq (DK03dy), the son of Thomas Declercq (DK03d), brother of Jan Declercq (DK03). To allow a difference, the lineage of Thomas Declercq (DK03d) in the bourgeoisie list appears as 'Declercq,' while that of Jan Declercq (DK03) appears as 'Le Clercq.'

[69] Marco Ferro, in the entries Adottare, Adottivo, Adozione of the Dizionario del diritto commune e Veneto, published in Venice between 1778 and 1781.

Montoya in Tournai enabled such. This is also found in the work of Maria Gigliola di Renzo Villata[70]. We do not assume that Jan Declercq (DK03) adopted the children as such, but the concept of entirely accepted stepchildren was not alien to society at that time and was a direct consequence of the marriage contract made in Tournai, explained in Chapter 29.11.3.3.

We see the first appearance as Bourgeois Forain in 1627, when Antoni (DC06) was precisely 25 years old and became an adult. His brother Miguel turned 25 in 1630, whence we find his first appearance not earlier than 1630; indeed, he first appeared in 1634, probably when he married or otherwise decided to use his Bourgeois rights.

In Figures 34.171, 34.172, 34.173, 34.174, 34.175, 34.176, 34.177, 34.178, 34.179, 34.180, 34.181, 34.182, 34.183, 34.184, 34.185, 34.186, 34.187, 34.188, 34.189, 34.190, 34.191, 34.192, 34.193, 34.194, 34.195, 34.196, 34.197, 34.198, 34.199, 34.200, 34.201, 34.202, 34.203, 34.204, 34.205, 34.206, 34.207, 34.208, 34.209, 34.210, 34.211, 34.212, 34.213, we show all the entries of Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) brother, Miguel Desclergue (DC06b), could not be confused with anybody else on the Bourgeoisie list in Kortrijk, whence he appears as 'Declercq' and not as 'Le Clercq' as his brother.

Nevertheless, Miguel Desclergue would also sometimes opt for the 'Le' annotation, as seen in Figure 29.160 on page 433, but not when he became a Bourgeois in 1634.

As described above, the gap between Figures 34.203 and 34.204 is caused by the family residing for a couple of years in Ghent during the French occupation of the region around Kortrijk.

34.12.3.2 The Father of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)

Beatrice was Noel Declercq's daughter (Noel is Natalis).

We have found a Natalis Declercq (DK02by) in Harelbeke, serving as Godfather to Catharina Onse, on August 13, 1616. The child was the daughter of Judocus Onse and Catharina DeKlerck ('Sclercx'), the godmother was Catharina Loosvelt. Note that the family name Onse appeared in Catalonia in the 17th century.

We also found Natalis Declercq (DK02by) in 1621 at Harelbeke as the wedding witness of Matheus Casiere and Christina du Bois, and the other witness was Guilielmus van Bonen. It's possible that Christina du Bois was related to Margriet de le Quellerie / Keldewier and Jean du Bois, who were involved in constructing the Chapel at Deerlijk in 1639, not very far from the Saint Columba church, shown in Figure 34.219. The chapel construction is described in Chapter 49.

In 1625, in Figure 34.220, Natalis Declercq (DK02by) was Godfather, in Harelbeke, to Elisabeta, daughter of Maria Van Putte or Du Puich. The godmother was Elisabeth de Smedt. On that baptism certificate, it is mentioned that Natalis was a shoe producer and that the mother and an unknown father conceived the child, for which he volunteered to be godfather. It concerns a family involving Irish, clearly in a military clan.

We must, therefore, conclude that Natalis, the father of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), was a shoe producer and had contacts with Spanish and Irish families and families who had been in excellent or unfortunate contact with foreigners.

Noel Declercq, the father of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) and son of Oste Declercq (DK02b), is found, as shown in Figures 34.222, 34.223, 34.224, 34.225, 34.226, 34.227, 34.228, 34.229, 34.230, 34.231, 34.232 and 34.233 on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk.

We have not found the mother of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx). She must have died before 1607 because her father Nathale or Natalis of Noel Declercq married as a widower on May 30, 1607, at Zwevegem, in Figure 34.221. The bride was Isabel van Wijnsberge, and the witnesses were Oste Declercq (DK02b) and Egidius Nutens (possible related to Nutens in Figure 34.241 on page 603). Since we found no further trace of Noel in Zwevegem, we assume his bride was from there, and the couple lived in Deerlijk. Possibly they had no children.

34.12.3.3 The Guardians

To continue interpreting the Orphan's deed, we remind the reader that it was customary to select one guardian from the mother's side and one guardian from the father's family, even if the father was still alive.

The clerk wrote 'Joos' twice at the beginning of the deed. This must have been done in error; it should have been Jan or Joan instead.

Indeed, Juan Declerque (DC07c), described in Chapter 36.4, was old enough; he married Beatrice de Pinto and became a military (an archer) in Spain that same year or the year after. In 1662, he requested to return to Flanders but was killed soon.

34.12.3.4 The Age of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Pere Declerque (DC07d)

The deed tells that Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Pere Declerque (DC07d) were unmarried minors (i.e., they had not reached the age of 25).

34.12.3.5 Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) was the Second Wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

The goods the two sons inherited reveal exciting facts. We refer to Chapter 36 to find all the children of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), whether from his first or second marriage.

Maria Declerque (DC07b), described in Chapter 36.5, was born in 1631 and, therefore, only 20 years old in 1651. However, because of her marriage to Rafael Juan de Pedrolo, she was no longer considered a minor and received a dowry, which excluded her from inheriting.

Let's summarize the inheritance structure: Antoni Desclergue (DC06) inherited half of a land and a barn with a house from his mother Felipa de Montoya. Upon his first marriage, he became the proprietor of 50% of that inherited property. When his wife passed away, the other 25% of the property would stay out of his future marriage and belong to him and their children. The part that went into the new marriage with Beatrice Desclercq (DK02byx) was the 25%, to be split in half when Beatrice died and went to their two sons. This means that each son inherited half of half a quarter of the total property, or one-sixteenth each. This detailed structure is evidence of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) being the second wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and the couple having two sons, Antoni (DC07) and Pere (DC07d) minors in 1651, and a married daughter, Maria (DC07b).

The children stemming from his first marriage did not inherit from Beatrice. They were Michiel (DC07f), Anna (DC07e) and Juan (DC07c).

For example, Anna Declerque (DC07e), described in Chapter 36.3, was born in 1621, was 30 years old in 1651, and had been married to Alonso Ximenes de la Cruz since 1639. Nevertheless, she did not inherit from Beatrice because she was the daughter of Antoni Desclergue's first wife. Similarly, Juan Declerque (DC07c), born around 1623, was not a son of Beatrice and, therefore, did not inherit from her.

34.12.3.6 Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was Still Alive in 1651

The father, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was still alive in 1651 when his wife Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) died, and he kept the other 50%.

34.13 The Kortrijk Clan of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) Antoni Desclergue's wife

34.13.1 Introduction

Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), the wife of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was introduced in Chapter 34.12.1. Her lineage holds significant importance as her bloodline merges with ours through her marriage and, consequently, because she is our ancestor. Beatrice's mother-in-law, Felipa de Montoya, was also connected to the Declercq clan through her marriage to Jan Declercq (DK03), detailed in Chapter 29.10.5. It is important to note that although we are related to this clan through Felipa de Montoya and Beatrice Declercq, we do not descend directly from Jan Declercq (DK03).[72]

The Declercq family of Kortrijk was distinguished by their roles as notaries, with some members engaged in commerce or religious vocations. Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) marriage to Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) represents the union of the Desclergue and Declercq clans.

In Figure 34.234 on page 598, for instance, we can see that Natalis[73] Declercq, the father of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), was in debt with someone in 1621 and that his son Pieter Declercq, known as Pedro Declercq, described in Chapter 35, paid the debt in 1635. Natalis Declercq (DK02by) resided in Deerlijk, just like Jan Declercq (DK03y),[74] whose sons had been the guardians of Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) brother Miguel Desclergue (DC06b) when their mother Felipa de Montoya died in 1629.

In Figure 34.235 on page 598, we can see that Natalis Declercq (DK02by) offered bail for Loys Denys in Kortrijk in 1622.

As described in Chapter 34.12.3.2, Noel Declercq was a shoe producer, which was, because of the military presence in the region, a lucrative business. It also brought Noel in contact with the Irish and Spanish military.

The Desclergues were not the only Spanish family marrying the Declercqs of Kortrijk. Another Spanish or Italian family, Grimaldi, did the same. The connection between Antoni Desclergue (DC06), his wife Beatrice Declercq, and the Grimaldi family is shown in Figure 34.239 on 602, and Figure 34.240 on 603.

The progenitor of Declercq was Jan Declercq (DK00), described in 34.13.2.

Given the frequent occurrence of the name Nicolas Declercq in the Declercq family lineages of Tournai and Kortrijk, it is plausible to speculate a connection to our Desclergue ancestors, particularly the branch residing in Manresa, described in Chapter 18.29, where the name Nicolas Desclergue was equally shared. This hypothesis, which holds significant potential for uncovering intriguing familial ties, requires further investigation by future genealogists to be fully substantiated.

The possibility of mere coincidence cannot be entirely dismissed. However, Jeroni Desclergue (DC05) 's rapid integration with the Declercq family of Kortrijk suggests a deeper connection. This swift acquaintance might be better explained by preexisting familial bonds or shared ancestry rather than coincidental name similarity alone.

Future research into this potential link between the Declercq and Desclergue families could yield fascinating insights into their genealogical roots. The prevalence of the name Nicolas in both family branches presents a compelling starting point for such inquiries. Exploring historical records, genetic testing, and other genealogical methods could further illuminate the connections between these families, enhancing our understanding of their shared heritage.

Jan Declercq (DK00) was a student at the Catholic University of Leuven, as found in the registers of the university in 1505 in February. It is shown in Figure 34.308 on page 617.

It still needs to be determined if Jan Declercq (DK00), the first Declercq we retrieved in Kortrijk, originated from Kortrijk or Tournai. An objective observation of all the discovered evidence related to his descendants indicates that he was probably from Tournai.

34.13.3 Nicolas Declercq (DK01)

Nicolas Declercq (DK01)[75] was, as far as we have been able to figure out, the son of Jan Declercq (DK00) described in Chapter 34.13.2.

Oste Declercq (DK02b) was the father of Natalis Declercq (DK02by) and the grandfather of our ancestor Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), described in Chapter 34.12.1, who married Antoni Desclergue (DC06).

34.13.4 Nicolas Declercq (DK02)

Nicolas Declercq (DK02) was the father of Jan T. Declercq (DK03), described in Chapter 34.13.7, Magdalena Declercq (DK03c), Tomas Declercq (Dk03d), described in Chapter 34.13.6, and another child (DK03e).

In Figure 34.236 on page 599, we read that Thirion Dupret, the son of Jan Dupret, transported a debt inherited from his father onto Nicolas Declercq (DK02) from Kortrijk, signed by Jan Claissone on behalf of the dominions of His Majesty the King, in 1561.

[72] In an earlier edition of this book, this clan was spelled as 'DeKlerk' to distinguish them from other Declercqs mentioned in this work. At that time, the Declercq clan had not been thoroughly investigated, and it was not yet known that Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) was blood-related to Jan Declercq (DK03). The familial connections established through Felipa de Montoya and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) later clarified why our family name transitioned from the Spanish 'Desclergue' to the Flemish 'Declercq.'

[73] Natalis is Noel

[74] Jan Declercq (DK03y) was married to Margareta Pauwels from Deerlijk.

[75] An observation concerning the prevalence of the name Nico or Nicolas in the Declercq family of Kortrijk and that of the Desclergues of Manresa, is indicated in a footnote in Chapter 18.29.1.

34.13.5 Jan Declercq (DK02a)

Jan Declercq (DK02a) was a son of Nicolas Declercq (DK01) and a brother of Nicolas Declercq (DK02) and Oste Declercq (DK02b). His son was Tomas Declercq (DK02ay1), cousin of Tomas Declercq (DK03d), Nicolas Declercq's (DK02) son, described in Chapter 34.13.6.
Another son was Jan Declercq (DK02ay2).

34.13.6 Tomas Declercq (DK03d)

34.13.6.1 Jan Declercq (DK03dy)

Jan Declercq (DK03dy), son of Tomas Declercq (DK03d) and the nephew of Jan Declercq (DK03), lived in Deerlijk and can be found on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk. He died around 1646. Jan Declercq's (DK03dy) uncle was Jan Declercq (DK03), described in Chapter 34.13.7.
His presence is shown in Figures 34.259, 34.260, 34.261, 34.262, 34.263, 34.264, 34.265, 34.266, 34.267, 34.268, 34.269, 34.270, 34.271, 34.272, 34.273, 34.274, 34.275, 34.276, 34.277, 34.278, 34.279, 34.280, 34.281, 34.282, 34.283, 34.284, 34.285, 34.286, 34.287, 34.288, 34.289, 34.290, 34.291, 34.292, 34.293, 34.294, 34.295, 34.296, 34.297, 34.298, 34.299, 34.300, 34.301, 34.302 and 34.303.
Because his children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren lived mostly in Deerlijk when the offspring of Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05) lived there too, and because, being related, they were acquainted, their appearances in Church certificates coincide and may cause great confusion to genealogists.[76]

Initially, the investigative process involved the comprehensive compilation of ecclesiastical records, which were subsequently subjected

34.13.7 Jan Declercq (DK03) & Isabeau Braye

34.13.7.1 Isabeau Braye

The Braye family was prominent in Kortrijk in the 17th century. Their origins were found in Tournai in the 16th century.[77]

In 1564, Joos Braye, the son of Jan Braye, was still alive and was married to Cathelyne Vandenberghe, as can be read in Figure 34.244 on page 605.

Guilielmus Braye became a student at the Catholic University of Leuven on December 12, 1640, as shown in Figure 34.307 on page 617. He was a relative of Isabeau Braye.

Interestingly, at the end of the 17th century, there was also a marriage between Braye and someone from the de Patin family, another ancestral branch of ours. This can be read in Chapter 70.2.4.

34.13.7.2 Jan Declercq (DK03)

Jan Declercq (DK03) was a notary at Kortrijk from 1588 until 1620.[78]

His descendants are shown in Figure 34.305 on page 616. His son, Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), described in Chapter 34.13.8.12, was also a notary in Kortrijk.

Apart from being a notary, Jan Declercq (DK03) also held other roles, such as school director. He was also responsible for allocating guardians to orphaned children and arranging their inheritance.

to clustering analysis.

Subsequent phases entailed scrutinizing supplementary Spanish and notarial documents and validating the identified clusters.

The genealogical connections within the familial networks of Jan Declercq and Catherine Van Wymelbeke in Waregem presented a complex puzzle. Overlapping given names and surnames added to the challenge. However, our perseverance and dedication to the research process eventually led to the elucidation of these connections, revealing straightforward ancestral lineages. This journey was not without its difficulties, requiring us to navigate through confusion, iterate model construction, and deconstruction. The satisfaction of a methodically executed investigation was the ultimate reward.

The role of clerical involvement in administrative documentation is of paramount importance in our research. The orthographic variations in personal names often reflect more about the clerical context than the individuals themselves. Priests, in their efforts to facilitate divine discernment, employ local phonetic renderings, standardized forms, or Latinized Flemish variations. These archival records, with their unique insights into historical familial dynamics, hold immense value for genealogical scholars. They warrant meticulous examination and appreciation for the role they play in our understanding of the Pauwels family and related lineages in Deerlijk and Waregem.

On December 1, 1588, Jan Declercq (DK03), the son of Nicolas Declercq (DK02) (whose wife inherited the interest from Joos Braye) declared that Symon Samyn had paid off a debt, as can be read in Figure 34.241 on page 603.

We can read that Joos Braye is the son of Jan Braye in Figure 34.242 on page 604, which states that Jan Declercq (DK03) paid money to pay off someone else's debt in 1583.

We can read in Figure 34.243 on page 605 that, in 1586, Jean du Bois, described in Chapter 49.9.2, was an acquaintance of Jan Declercq (DK03) and that the latter was the governor of a school in Kortrijk.

In Figure 34.244 on page 605, we can, for instance, read that Jan Declercq (DK03) was a notary in 1602.

Jan Declercq (DK03) took the role as weesheer (orphan lord), as can be read in a 1612 document in Figure 34.254 on page 610.

In 1625, Jan Declercq (DK03) was still alive, as we can read in Figure 34.246 on page 606.

Evidence that Jan Declercq (DK03) had property, or, at least, a guarantee based on a property, in Deerlijk is shown in Figure 34.247 on page 607.

Jan Declercq (DK03) died on December 30, 1640.

Even in 1601, we can read that a connection existed between Jan Declercq (DK03) and Felipa de Montoya, the wife of Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05), as described in Chapter 29.10.4.

34.13.8 The Lives of the Biological Descendants of Nicolas Declercq (DK02

34.13.8.1 Jan Declercq (DK03dya)

Jan Declercq (DK03dya) was the son of Jan Declercq (DK03dy) and Margareta Pauwels. He married Martina Vander Beke before 1624 and Jossina Nooters after 1624. Jan Declercq's wife (DK03dya), Martina Vander Beke, appeared as godmother to Martina de la Cruz at Dudzele in 1624, as described in Chapter 37.4. It means that Jan (DK03dya) very likely has been military at Damme for some time during that period, probably convinced by Antoni Desclergue (DC06), or else he may have been married to a daughter of a military who was involved in the area of Damme. We don't know. Given his age at that time, 42, it's more likely, however, that the connection was the result of Felipa de Montoya, a relative of the de la Cruz family, as outlined in Chapter 37.4 and Chapter 29.10.6, who entered the clan of Jan (DK03dya) through her marriage, in 1611, with Jan Declercq (DK03).

Jan Declercq's (DK03dya) presence on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk is shown in Figures 34.313, 34.314, 34.315, 34.316, 34.317, 34.318, 34.319, 34.320, 34.321, 34.322, 34.323, 34.324, 34.325, 34.326, 34.327, 34.328, 34.329, 34.330, 34.331, 34.332, 34.333, 34.334, 34.335, 34.336, 34.337, 34.338 and 34.339.

34.13.8.2 Family of Jan Declercq (DK03dya)

The orphan's deed in Figure 34.340, in 1655, found upon the death of Jan Declercq (DK03dya), reveals some details about his family at that time.

In summary, the orphan's deed in Figure 34.340 states that there were four children below 25 years old (or were perpetually considered minors for other reasons). Their guardians were their uncles Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) and Lauwereyns Vander Beke, son of Steven, both from Deerlijk. The orphans inherited a farm, 2500 lands extensive, consisting of 5 pieces of land joint together, at Desselgem (Sint Pieters), half of a land of 100 lands at Desselgem (also Sint Pieters), half of a land of 100 lands at Desselgem (also Sint Pieters), half of a land of 1400 lands in two parts at Beveren-Leie (also Sint Pieters); half of a land of 800 lands at Desselgem (Cuypers) and a land of 800 lands at Desselgem (Ten Rade). The latter land was given to their disabled brother Anthonius (DK03dyay1). So, altogether, the descendants of Pieter Declercq inherited 6200 lands. Given that 100 lands equal 885 square meters, they inherited 54870 square meters or 5.5 hectares. Jan Declercq (DK03dya) had been Foreign Bourgeois of Kortrijk at Deerlijk from 1618 until 1652.

34.13.8.3 Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb)

Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) would marry four times and have many children. His first marriage, in Figure 34.341, occurred in Wervik, located along the Leie River, and is passed when traveling, for instance, along the river, from Kortrijk to Loos or Lille. Therefore, this is not surprising. We have found no further trace of the couple. Probably the bride, Maria Legin, died at a young age without children. From his wedding onward, in 1612, Pieter became Buitenpoorter of Kortrijk at Deerlijk, whence we may assume that the couple did not live at Wervik but at Deerlijk. Pieter would be Bourgeois Forain from 1612 until 1657 and get children from 3 marriages between the 1620s and 1654.

Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) became a Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk at a very young age. Two mechanisms helped to achieve this status. First, in the publication 'De Poorterij en buitenpoorterij in Vlaanderen' [79], we find that a child could become Foreign Bourgeois of Kortrijk if he registered with his father[80]. Second, the fact that he married that year, in Figure 34.341, may have been a sufficient condition to declare him an adult and become a Foreign Bourgeois. His appearance is shown in Figures 34.342, 34.343, 34.344, 34.345, 34.346, 34.347, 34.348, 34.349, 34.350, 34.351, 34.352, 34.353, 34.354, 34.355, 34.356, 34.357, 34.358, 34.359, 34.360, 34.361, 34.362, 34.363, 34.364, 34.365, 34.366, 34.367, 34.368, 34.369, 34.370, 34.371, 34.372, 34.373, 34.374, 34.375, 34.376, 34.377, 34.378 and 34.379.

34.13.8.4 The family of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb)

Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb) married Joanna de Poorter or Judoca de Pootere in June 1642 at Deerlijk. She was his 4th wife. Witnesses were Mrs de Witte, indicated by the priest as the bride's mother, and Antoni Desclergue (DC06), who had returned from Spain. In contrast, the priest did not characterize their relationship. Indeed, although acquainted and residing in Deerlijk, their family bond was further than a priest would normally indicate in such a document.

One of Pieter's sons, namely Jan Declercq (DK03dyby1), was Foreign Bourgeois of Kortrijk at Deerlijk from 1655 until 1672. The descendants are shown in Figures 34.380, 34.381, 34.382 and 34.383.

34.13.8.5 The family of Joannes Declercq (DK03dyby1)

We found the wedding in June 1653 in Deerlijk, in Figure 34.384, of Joannes Declercq (DK03dyby1) and Christina Vandriesche. The witnesses are compelling: namely, Joanna/Judoca De Poorter (De Pooter/Depotter), who was the stepmother of Joannes, i.e. second wife of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb); and typically, one would expect a second witness from the family of the bride, but perhaps she had no family at that time in Deerlijk; therefore the nearest witness would have been the groom's uncle, namely Jan Declercq (DK03dya) who was replaced by his son Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), who, at that time, was already married to Elizabeth de Laere. The replacement may have been related to the health of Jan Declercq (DK03dya) because we know that he died a little later than one year after this wedding.

Joannes Declercq's (DK03dyby1) appearance on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk is given in Figures 34.385, 34.386, 34.387, 34.388, 34.389, 34.390, 34.391, 34.392, 34.393, 34.394, 34.395, 34.396 and that of his son in 34.397.

Although it is not our intention to dive too deep into the side branch of Declercq because they are not our ancestors, we would like to show a gorgeous baptism certificate of one of his granddaughters Christina Declercq (DK03dyby1x4), in Figure 34.400, in 1666 because it appeared as the first one of the registration book, underneath a heading.

34.13.8.6 Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e)

We have found a baptism of Jan Declercq's daughter, Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e), in Figure 34.439.

She was born at Kortrijk on April 3, 1591. Given the distribution of possessions after the death of her stepmother Felipa de Montoya, outlined in Chapter 29.11.3.3, we know that she was still alive in 1628. However, we have found no further details. This is proven by a document in 1630.

Indeed, Maria Magdalena Declercq was married to Jan Vanessche and she was the daughter of Jan Declercq (DK03) and Isabeau Braye, the daughter of Joos Braye, which can be read in a note on August 5, 1630 in Figure 34.244 on page 605.

The second husband of Maria Magdalena Declercq (DK04e), Philips Deberhem, was a prosecutor in the Council of Flanders. Her first husband was Jan Vanessche. This is evidenced in Figure 34.438 on page 629.

34.13.8.7 Jacomyne Declercq (DK03dyc)

We have found no further descendants of Jacomyne Declercq (DK03dyc); however, documents, as in Figure 34.398, refer to her.

34.13.8.8 Anna Declercq (DK03dyd)

Anne Declercq married Robertus Verhaeghe, and they had a daughter, Maria Verhaeghe, at Waregem in 1608. Jan Declercq (DK02ay2) from Deerlijk, son of Jan Declercq (DK02a), was godfather. In 1611, Anne Declercq had a son, Jacobus Verhaeghe; their godmother was Jacomyne Declercq, daughter of Jan Declercq from Deerlijk.

In 1613 she had a son Stephanus Verhaeghe. Anne also served as godmother to Anna Bollaert in Waregem in 1611. Jacomyne served as godmother to Jacomyne DeSmet at Harelbeke in 1611. The descendants are shown in Figure 34.399.

34.13.8.9 Ambrosius Declercq (DK04k)

Ambrosius Declercq (DK04k), son of Jan Declercq (DK03) and grandson of Nicolas Declercq (DK02), was a religious in Ghent in St. Peter's Abbey, in 1622, as can be read in Figure 34.245 on page 606.

34.13.8.10 Jeronimus Joannes Declercq (DK04h)

Jeronimus Joannes Declercq (DK04h), son of Jan Declercq (DK03) and grandson of Nicolas Declercq (DK02), was a religious, namely presbyter of the abbey in Loos, in 1622, as can be read in Figure 34.245 on page 606, and in Figure 34.249 on page 608. He was named after his father's friend, our ancestor Jeroni Joan Desclergue (DC05).

34.13.8.11 Cathelyne Declercq (DK04j)

Cathelyne Declercq (DK04j), daughter of Jan Declercq (DK03) and granddaughter of Nicolas Declercq (DK02), was a religious of the abbey in Wevelgem, in 1622, as can be read in Figure 34.245 on page 606.

34.13.8.12 Nicolas Declercq (DK04g)

Nicolas Declercq was the son of notary Jan T. Declercq, described in Chapter 34.13.7.2. He was also a notary from 1608 until 1635 and died in 1636.

In Figure 34.256 on page 611, we see that Nicolas Declercq (DK04g) was acquainted with Petrus Laurentius De Vos in 1621. As outlined in Part X, the families Declercq and De Vos would later merge through Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), cousin of Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), through the marriage, in 1685, of Joanna Catharina Declercgz, the daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz, with Joannes de Vos, the son of Petrus Laurentius de Vos and Isabella Verscheure.

Nicolas Declercq (DK04g) took the role of high-bailiff, as can be read in a 1602 document shown in Figure 34.444 on page 632.

Nicolas Declercq (DK04g), the son of Jan Declercq (DK03), had possessions in Kortrijk that he had sold to the monastery of Harelbeke, as can be read in Figure 34.443 on page 632.

34.13.8.13 Arnoult Declercq (DK04gy1), Son of Nicolas Declercq (DK04g)

In Figure 34.250 on page 609 and Figure 34.251 on page 609, we read that the Declercq family was acquainted with the Andries family. This is of importance in Chapter 50.

34.13.8.14 Isabeau Declercq (DK04gx1), the Daughter of Nicolas (DK04g) and wife of Claudio Grimaldi

Isabeau Declercq (DK04gx1), the daughter of Nicolas (DK04g), was married to Glaude Grimaldi, and they had a daughter Magdalena Grimaldi. This can be read in Figure 34.446 on page 633 and in Figure 34.445 on page 633.

The Grimaldi family originated from Genoa and were patricians, from which some Genoese merchands produced offspring in Andalusia. The Grimaldi family in Kortrijk originated from Andalusia and was acquainted with the Desclergues through their presence in Sevilla. Similar families are Spinola, Salvaggio, Di Negro, or Cattaneo, who are also found in Andalusia under Espínola, Salvago, Negro, and Cataño.

34.13.8.15 Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), the Son of Jan Declercq (DK03dya)

Anthonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), who had a disability (the word 'cripple' was used), would marry a 'De Lara,' maybe with Spanish roots, or Flemish (De Laere). He has been a Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk from 1678 until 1696.

In fact, Anthonius Declercq (DK03dyay1) requires some extra consideration. Indeed, some genealogists assume that it was not him who married Elizabeth Delaere or De Lara, but rather Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) after his wife Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx) had died. However, we have discovered that this is unlikely for the following reasons.

The first one is Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), listed as Anthonius Declercq f Jans, the second is Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), listed as Anthonius Le Clercq f Jans. Perhaps this situation was also confusing to the register of the Bourgeoisie Forain at Kortrijk, which is why they would, in later years, clearly, write that Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1) was not a son of Jan, but Jan 'the younger.' Indeed, Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1) was the son of Jan Declercq (DK03dya), who was the son of Jan Declercq (DK03dy).

Second, indeed, the orphan's deed for the children of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), given in Chapter 34, was made on July 17, 1651. It would not be wise to marry before that date because the inheritance must be known to establish a new marriage contract, if any.

Elizabeth Delaere married Anthonius Declercq (DK03dyay1) on April 18, 1651, in Figure 34.403. At Elizabeth's wedding, Jacobus Courtens, brother-in-law of Pieter Declercq (DK03dyb), and Judoca De Laere were witnesses, not anyone from the Desclergue family.

Besides, not a single member of the Desclergues family has ever served as godfather or godmother to any of the children of Declercq-De Laere.

When the father of Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), namely Jan Declercq (DK03dya), died in 1654, the orphan's deed of January 1655 contained four children, including Antonius. It means that, under normal circumstances, he would have been born not earlier than 1629, and therefore he would have been less than 23 years old when he married, which is plausible. Still, if he were married, he would typically no longer be considered a minor in 1655. However, the orphan's deed clearly states that he was crupel ende simple, which means he was considered cripple and mentally retarded. We cannot go back in time to figure out precisely the problem, but this statement has legal consequences. It is known that, under such circumstances, such a person would always appear on an orphan's deed if one of the parents died. Therefore, the age of 25 when a person became an adult did not hold for his case[81].

A reasonable assumption would be that he was indeed less than 25 years old but that because of his handicap, his marriage, which took place three years before, did not change his legal status from a minor to an adult.

His inheritance probably supported his marriage and descendants because the orphan's deed indicates that he received more than his siblings. The fact that he already had two children when his mother died, despite his handicap, may have been a different reason for giving more to him than to his siblings.

His health condition may have contributed to his late registration as a Foreign Bourgeois. Indeed, it was not until 1678 that he became a Foreign Bourgeois of Kortrijk at Deerlijk for 18 years. Antoni probably died around 1696. If we assume that he was born in 1630, he reached 66 years.

Antonius Declercq's (DK03dyay1) appearances on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk are shown in Figures 34.404, 34.405, 34.406, 34.407, 34.408, 34.409, 34.410, 34.411, 34.412, 34.413, 34.414, 34.415, 34.416, 34.417 and 34.418.

34.13.8.16 Adrianus Declercq (DK03dyay1y2)

Adrianus Declercq (DK03dyay1y2) was a son of Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1). He was born in Deerlijk in 1655 and married in 1677 at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent to Maria Margarita Periau.

He was a Flemish military in the Spanish-ruled army and had had the opportunity to join the army, thanks to his step-family through his Great-Great-grandfather Jan Declercq (DK03). We assume that he settled in Deerlijk after his career and became a Bourgeois Forain like most of his family.

Documents of interest other than Figure 34.403 on page 627, are given in Figures 34.419, 34.420 and 34.421.

Adrianus Declercq's (DK03dyay1y2) presence on the list of 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk is shown in Figures 34.422, 34.423, 34.424, 34.425, 34.426, 34.427, 34.428, 34.429, 34.430, 34.431, 34.432, 34.433, 34.434, 34.435 and 34.436.

34.13.8.17 Joanna Declercq (DK03dyay1x2)

Joanna Declercq (DK03dyay1x2) was a sister of Adrianus Declercq (DK03dyay1y2) and a daughter of Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1). She appeared in Ghent as a witness in Figure 34.437.

Chapter 35

Pedro de Clerque (DK02by2), the Brother-in-law of Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06)

35.1 Introduction

Pedro Declercq, locally known as 'Pieter Declercq (DK02by2),' appears in 1635 in Kortrijk to pay the debt of his father Natalis Declercq (DK02by). The event is shown in Figure 34.234 on page 598.
The Spanish army consisted of a minority of Iberians and was primarily international; most militaries were Flemish, Walloon, Burgundian, German, and Milanese. Pedro de Clerque, or Pieter Declercq, was a Flemish military in the Spanish army. Despite the similarity of the name, there is no blood relationship between the Desclergues and 'Declercq .' Antoni Desclergue (DC06) was married to Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx). Both are our ancestors, and Beatrice was the daughter of Noel Declercq or Natalis Declercq (DK02by). Lists of Bourgeois foraines suggest that Natalis was a son of Oste, which is also evidenced in Figure 34.234 on page 598.

35.2 His Bloodline

As indicated in the introduction, based on the found evidence, Pieter was a son of Noel or Natalis and a grandson of Oste. His descendants are shown in Figure 35.1 on page 637.

35.3 His Military Career

Pieter Declercq, son of Noel Declercq and brother of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), appears on the 'bourgeoisie foraine' list of Kortrijk at Deerlijk in Figures 35.3, 35.4, 35.5, 35.6, 35.7, 35.8, 35.9, 35.10, 35.11, 35.12, 35.13, 35.14, 35.15 and 35.16.
He was absent in 1634, 1639, 1640, 1644, 1647, and after 1650. He may have died in 1650 or moved somewhere else. A regular absence may have resulted from dispatching to distant lands during those years. His brother-in-law, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was equally absent in 1639-1640.
We believe we found his death certificate at the military hospital Bijloke in Ghent in 1668, in Figure 35.2.
Contextual indications:
1634: Carlos Coloma went to Spain this year. Therefore, there have been some rearrangements in the Flemish leadership and reorganizations of the army.
1644: From 1643 onwards, there was a war between France and the Spanish Netherlands. So it is possible that Pieter Declercq was involved in the military in the period around 1644 and did not reside in Deerlijk.
1647: Kortrijk was in French hands, which may be why he was not registered this year.
1650: Manel Güell[1] mentions unrest in Catalunya, followed by the Siege of Barcelona from July 1651 until October 1652.
Indeed, in Chapter 34.8, we described that Antoni Desclergue (DC06) participated in the Siege of Barcelona with his two brothers-in-law, Pedro and Juan. Juan is described in Chapter 36.4.

Chapter 36

The children of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

36.1 Introduction

Upon examining our paternal lineage, it is evident that this generation marks the first occurrence of Desclergues born in Belgium. To preserve a good overview of the descendants of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), we present four generations of descendants in Figure 36.1.

36.2 Antoni Declerque (DC07), the Son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

The study of ancestors occurred from the present to the past. We, therefore, studied Antoni (DC07) before the older ancestors. His generation brought us the necessary indications of foreign ancestry, which happened many years before writing the current book and DNA testing. We redirect the reader to Chapter 37.

36.3 Anna Declerque (DC07e), the Daughter of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

She may have been the reason for her brother Antoni (DC07) to Mary Martina de la Cruz. Ana Declerque (DC07e) was born in 1621 to Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) first wife. At 18, she married Alonso Ximenes de la Cruz at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent in 1639, shown in Figure 36.2.

In 1656, her brother Antoni Desclergue (DC07), described in Chapter 36.2, would marry Martina de la Cruz, a relative of Alonso, at Deerlijk. Note, however, that the Ximenes de la Cruz and the Desclergues were also distantly related through the Montoya family. This is described in a section devoted to Martina de la Cruz, Chapter 37.4, and Felipa de Montoya, Chapter 29.10.

The baptism of Ana Declerque's (DC07e) children are shown in Figures 36.3, 36.4, 36.5 and 36.6.

36.4 Juan Declerque (DC07c), the Son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

36.4.1 Introduction

Juan Declerque (DC07c) was a Flemish soldier in the Spanish army, born in Cambrai around 1623. His father was Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and his mother was Antoni's first wife. Juan passed away in Ghent in 1667.

At some point in his life, he pursued higher education. In 1643, as shown in Figure 37.3 in Chapter 37, he was enrolled as a student at the University of Leuven.

As a person from Cambrai, part of the Spanish Netherlands at the time, Juan might have been drawn to the Catholic University of Leuven due to its prestigious reputation as a leading center for Catholic education and intellectual thought. The university was known for its rigorous academic programs and alignment with the Spanish Habsburg rulers' religious and political values, making it an attractive destination for young men seeking education and advancement within the Spanish territories.

36.4.2 His Military Career

Being a son of Antoni (DC06) provided easy access to the army and vice versa; it should have been easy for the military to recruit them.

In Chapter 34, concerning Antoni Desclergue (DC06), we find that he took part in the Siege of Barcelona in 1651. Juan Declerque 's (DC07c) wife was Beatrice Maria Du Puich or Vandeputte. She would call herself Beatriz Maria de Pinto in Spain, as described in Chapter 34.8.

Around the probable time of his recruitment in the 1640s, several church documents clearly indicate a significant military presence in the region just north of Cambrai, an area frequently under French attack. This evidence is detailed in Chapter 34.

To gain insight into the life and career of Juan Declerque, we can examine the published Spanish archives.

He is found as Arquero (Archer) number 184, under the name of Juan Declerque (DC07c), on page 57 in 'La nobleza en las armas: Noble Guardia de Arqueros de Corps' , by Federico Navarro et al.[1], in one Decree and in three petitions:

Juan Declerque (DC07c) died at the military hospital Bijloke in Ghent, and his death was reported under the name 'Jan Cleer,' shown in Figure 36.7.

Because Juan Declerque (DC07c) was appointed guardian in 1651, we know that he must have been born before 1626. This means he was at least 41 years old when he died, probably 43.

36.4.3 Beatrice Maria Vandeputte, the wife of Juan Declerque (DC07c)

As indicated above, Beatrice Maria Vandeputte would be called Beatrice Maria De Pinto in Spain. We believe she may have been born in Harelbeke in 1615, given the baptism certificate shown in Figure 36.8.

36.5 Maria Declerque (DC07b) the Daughter of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

She was baptized in Deerlijk in 1631, in Figure 36.9.

Around the time of the Siege of Barcelona of 1651, she joined her parents in Spain. She married, either at Valls or Montblanc, Rafael Juan de Pedrolo, who was a trustee of the family and had been appointed as guardian to Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergues after the death of Francesc Desclergue (DC05e). More details are also found in Chapter 28.5.

About Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergues, we found the following citation[2]:

'Pedrolo, originari d' una nissaga cerverina, pertanyia a la branca familiar de Valls, i era fill de Rafael Joan de Pedrolo, cavaller, natural de Valls, i de Maria Desclugues (o Desclergue), dama de Montblanc.' in a description of 'Pau d' àger, comanador de l' orde de Sant Joan de Jerusalem (1659-1662).'

This reference confirms that Rafael Juan de Pedrolo of Valls (Tarragona), son of Gabriel de Pedrolo and Magdalena Monfar of Barcelona, had married Maria Declerque (DC07b) around 1651, around the time of the Siege of Barcelona, when she visited Spain with her father Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) and her mother, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx).

Maria Desclergue (DC07b) and Rafael Juan de Pedrolo of Valls had no children. She returned to Flanders before 1673.

36.6 Joan Declerque (DC07g), the Son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06)

The child was born in Deerlijk in 1634, in Figure 36.10, and we found little information about him. Perhaps he never married or died early.

36.7 Pere Declerque (DC07d), the Son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Soldier

He was born in 1640 at Deerlijk. His baptism in Figure 36.25 is also described in Chapter 34.5.13. Pere Declerque (DC07d) married Florence Vandenbulke at Deerlijk in 1665 at the age of 22, in Figure 36.27. Florence Vandenbulke 's baptism in 1643 is shown in Figure 36.26, and her funeral in 1677 is in Figure 36.28. Pere Declerque (DC07d) remarried Thérèse Du Blanc, De Buck, or De Bick soon after.

The couple named their first child, in Figure 36.29 after Pere's grandmother Felipa de Montoya, namely Juana Felipa Declergz ('Joanna Philippa De Clercgz'). Because the family was in the middle of a struggle with the French army and had to move from one place to the other continually, they baptized their daughter on their passage through Sint Eloois Vijve on April 5, 1678.

Sint Eloois Vijve switched sides frequently between the French forces and the Spanish coalition forces. Therefore, it was likely disadvantageous to inform the priest that the father was from Deerlijk and was in French hands. So, the information was limited to 'the father is a wandering soldier' ('militis vagantis'). The area Waregem-Sint-Eloois-Vijve indeed became alternatingly Spanish and French.

In the same year, just after the summer, we found, for instance, a baptism in Figure 36.30 of a child of Spanish soldier Juan Sanz.

Pere Declerque (DC07d) also appeared on 'la bourgeoisie foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk, shown in Figures 36.11, 36.12, 36.13, 36.14, 36.15, 36.16, 36.17, 36.18, 36.19, 36.20, 36.21, 36.22, 36.23, and 36.24.

He first appeared in 1670, and in the following years, he was missing: 1673-1677, 1679-1683, 1688, 1690-1705, 1710-1712. Some of these absences are likely due to his military career.

Our ancestor Pere Declercgz (DC08), born in 1673, was named after him, although he was absent upon the baptism due to his military career.

36.8 Michiel Declerque (DC07f), the Son of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and Merchant

These records provide valuable insight into his professional activities and status within the commercial community of Kortrijk during that period.

The father, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was absent, and therefore the priest was confused about the involved names. The child's correct Spanish name would have been Pere or Pedro Desclergue y Declercq. The priest first wrote 'De Celcg Clerck', then changed it to 'Clerck', and was then confused about the mother's name and decided to spell hers as 'De Clercke'. Chapter 37

Antoni Declerque (DC07) & Martina de la Cruz

37.1 Introduction

Don Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) is a patrilineal ancestor.
There are indications that Antoni Declerque (DC07) has also been a military. Indeed, his frequent absence as a Bourgeous Forain in Kortrijk, shown in Chapter 37.3, may be due to temporary warfare involvement. For instance, Antoni (DC07) likely joined his father Antoni (DC06) in Spain to recruit military in 1668 or was otherwise involved, as described in Chapter 34.10.
Antoni's (DC07) siblings were equally involved in the military directly or as spouses, as described in Chapter 36.
It shows that the Desclergues had military involvement and were mainly in touch with other Spanish descendants until the 18th century.
Antoni Declerque (DC07) died in 1699-1700, just before the Spanish Succession War, described in Chapter 8.12.2. As we have not found any burial records, we assume he had his funeral in a military chapel, just like his Spanish ancestors in Belgium.

37.2 Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07), the Son of Don Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06) and Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)

He was also retrieved, shown in Figure 37.3, in 1643, enrolled as a student at the University of Leuven.
The orphan's deed of Antoni Desclerque's (DC07) mother, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), in 1651, as referenced in Chapter 34.8 and detailed in Chapter 34.12.3, is a significant piece of evidence. This legal document suggests that Antoni (DC07) had not yet turned 25 in 1651, indicating that he was born after 1626.
Therefore, both the orphan's deed and the University of Leuven enrollment align, confirming that Antoni (DC07) was born after 1626.
Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) married in 1656, aged 30 or less, in Deerlijk, Belgium, to Martina Vercruyce / De la Cruz, 31. The wedding, therefore, took place four years after the great fire at Montblanc. His father, Antoni (II) (DC06), witnessed the wedding.
Antoni (DC07) and Martina's children were Joanna (DC08b)(1657), Joan (DC08c)(1661), Maria (DC08d)(1665), Maria Catarina (DC08e)(1669) and Pere (II) (DC08) (1673). The latter is our paternal ancestor. Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) was a Doncel.

37.3 Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) on the List of 'la Bourgeoisie Foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk

Antoni Declerque (DC07) was a Bourgeois Forain of Kortrijk at Deerlijk from 1657 until 1699, shown in Figures 37.4, 37.5, 37.6, 37.7, 37.8, 37.9, 37.10, 37.11, 37.12, 37.13, 37.14, 37.15, 37.16, 37.17, 37.18, 37.19, 37.20, 37.21, 37.22, 37.23, 37.24, 37.25, 37.26, 37.27, 37.28, 37.29 and 37.30.
We assume that he died around 1700. He must have been buried in a military chapel, like his ancestors, because we have not found his death certificate in any regular churches.
He was absent in specific years, namely in 1659, 1663, 1668-1669, 1673-1677 (French occupation of Kortrijk), 1679-1680, 1682, 1688,

As described in Chapter 34.11, Antoni's (DC07) father, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), visited Spain in 1679 for a wedding after the Peace of Nijmegen. Likely, Antoni Declerque (DC07) went too.

37.3.1 Etymology of de la Cruz

The surname de la Cruz means 'from the cross.' There is evidence of name variations being used interchangeably, particularly in regions with linguistic diversity. For example, in Flemish, de la Cruz can translate to Vercruysse or Vandercruyssen. These translations often happened as families migrated and adapted to different languages and cultures. The use of the name de la Cruz began in the medieval period, likely around the time of the Crusades, which influenced many surnames of the era. The name was prominently established in Spain before spreading to other regions through migration and colonial expansion.

37.4 The Ancestry of Martine Vercruyce or Martina de la Cruz, with Roots in Spain

In Chapter 29.10.6, the relationship between Martina de La Cruz and Felipa de Montoya is revealed.

Apart from this relationship, we have also found numerous other connections between the Desclergues and Ximenes de la Cruz's clan, observed in baptisms and weddings.

Interestingly, Martina's father-in-law, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), was a stepbrother of her godmother's husband, Jan Declercq (DK03dya). The family Ximenes de la Cruz, whose presence can be traced in locations of historical significance for the defense of Flanders, is found in Damme (with residence in Dudzele), the Spaniard Castle of Ghent, and Sint Eloois Vijve. Martina's ancestors, who played a crucial role in these historical events, are shown in Figure 37.31.

To better understand her family, we have added to the descendency trees of two of her ancestors in Figures 37.32 and 37.33 of Christobal Cuello de la Cruz, respectively Miguel Ximenes.

On certificates, such as her baptism in Figure 37.34, Martina Ximenes de la Cruz appears as Cruz/Cruys, and in the Flemish colloquial version Vercruce, Vercruyce and Vercruysse. The Spanish version of her name was De la Cruz, or if we assume the entire inheritance of her father's name, even Ximenes de la Cruz.

The author's autosomal DNA also shares several sequences with persons carrying the name de la Cruz, shown in Chapter 73.10.3.5.

Martina has been a genealogical puzzle. It has taken a significant amount of time and effort to unearth her roots. From, for instance, the baptism in Harelbeke, of Martina Vercruyce's granddaughter Maria Anna De Vos, we can identify that Martina Vercruyce (de la Cruz) was the daughter of Petrus Vercruyce (de la Cruz) and that Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) was the son of Antoni Declerque (II) (DC06). This discovery had helped us rule out other possible roots (e.g. Deerlijk or Waregem or neighboring villages) when we investigated this ancestry early.

Simultaneously, it also confirmed that indeed Antoni Declerque (II) (DC06), who was a witness to his wedding in Deerlijk in 1656, was, in fact, Antoni's (DC07) father.

Martina, the person we focus on here, was baptized in Dudzele on December 5, 1624. Her godfather was Paulus Deckers, described in Chapter 49.5 and Chapter 49.2.2, and her godmother was Martina, wife of 42-year-old Jan Declercq (DK03dya), described in Chapter 34.13.8.1 and step-nephew of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), Martina's future father in law.

Jan's (DK03dya) daughter-in-law Elizabeth de Laere, wife of Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), would later also serve as godmother to Elizabeth Loncke, the daughter of Joannes Loncke and Margareta Vercruysse.

Jan Declercq (DK03dya) was the stepbrother of Antoni Desclergue (DC06). Elizabeth de Laere served as godmother to Joan Declercgz (DC08c), Martina de la Cruz, and Antoni Declerque's (DC07) son.

Therefore, Jan Declercq (DK03dya) and his daughter-in-law have always been important to Martina de la Cruz. Very likely, Jan Declercq (DK03dya) had also been a military, which is how he knew the family Ximenez de la Cruz and how the contact remained, either in Dudzele, Sint Eloois Vijve or Deerlijk. Jan Declercq (DK03dya) was related to the Ximenes de la Cruz family by marrying his stepmother's sister, Maria de Montoya, to Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz, father of Martina de la Cruz. Later, Martina would marry Antoni's (DC06) son, Antoni Declerque (DC07).

In other words, Martina married the grandson of her stepmother's sister.

37.4.1 Father and son Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz at Sint Eloois Vijve

In the Middle Ages, a fortress in Sint Eloois Vijve was found in Figure 37.35. Its strategic location along the Leie River, with a side branch to Ingelmunster and the road from Kortrijk to Ghent, required a small stronghold, even in Spanish times and later during the troubles with France. It's also where the Gaverbeek Creek used to reach the Leie River, connected to Waregem, Deerlijk, and Harelbeke.

Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz was the son of Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz and was baptized at the Spanish stronghold in Sint Eloois Vijve in 1636, in Figure 37.37.

Carlos Senior was likely the eldest brother of Martina de la Cruz or her uncle. We have yet to find his baptism. He was stationed at Sint Eloois Vijve, where there was a Spanish fortress. We discovered that Carlos Senior died in Sint Eloois Vijve in 1638, shown in Figure 37.38, two years after the birth of his son Carlos Junior. Life in the military was not without risks. Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz senior resided at the Spanish stronghold at Sint Eloois Vijve and married Judoca Van Dale. His son Carlos Junior was married to Elizabeth Van Dale. Their children are shown in Figures 37.40, 37.41 and 37.42.

Carlos Senior was likely Martina de la Cruz's uncle, or he may have been her eldest brother. A connection with Dudzele, probably with persons involved with Damme's defense, still existed in the 1650s.

More records of interest are shown in Figures 37.43, 37.44 and 37.45.

His uncle was Jose Ximenez de la Cruz, equally residing at the fortress of Sint Eloois Vijve, who married a local in 1641, in Figure 37.39.

The family Roose or Rosa, shown in Figure 37.39, was also linked with the Ximenes de la Cruz when they resided in Dudzele.

In Dudzele, the village where Martina de la Cruz was born, Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz junior appeared as godfather in 1655 of the child Carolus Helsmoortel in Figure 37.46, son of Joannes Helsmoortel and Catarina van Wiepe. Note that Wiepe and Helsmoortel were prevalent names at Ostend before the Siege of Ostend, so those families probably fled and settled in Dudzele after the Siege.

He also served as a witness on the wedding of Petronilla Ximenes de la Cruz in Figure 37.47, possibly his sister or a cousin in replacement of his father, Carlos Ximenes de la Cruz senior, who was dead.

The situation is complicated, as in Deerlijk, in the life of Carlos junior, there is also 'Charles Vercruysse' who has children with Beatrix Coucke (1658, 1660, 1663) and is, in fact, Carlos junior, but here is also a Charles Vercruysse who has children with Beatrix Huyge (1667) and Beatrix Beckaert (1670). Either this is a coincidence, or Charles Vercruysse always married women with the name Beatrix.[1] Beatrix Coucke, who married Carlos Junior, was from Vichte. She married Charles Vercruysse (Carolus Antonius Vandercruyce) at Vichte in 1657. Neither he nor Martina are found on baptism lists or certificates at Vichte, so they were not from Vichte. The priest at Vichte even indicated Charles' foreign origin because he wrote 'Vandercruyssen,' whereas, for all others at Vichte, he wrote 'Vercruysse.' The local Vercruysse records are shown in Figures 37.48, 37.49, 37.50, 37.51 and 37.52.

Evidence that this is the correct family is found in one of the birth certificates of the children of Joannes Loncke and Margareta Vercruysse. On their daughter Elizabeth Loncke's baptism at Deerlijk, on February 3, 1666, in Figure 37.53, Elizabeth De Laere served as godmother. Elizabeth de Laere was the wife of Antonius Declercq (DK03dyay1), son of Jan Declercq (DK03dya) and Jossine Nooters, step-siblings of Antoni Desclergue (DC06), and related with his wife, Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx). This family is found in Chapter 34.13.7. Jan Declercq (DK03dya) was also related to the Ximenes de la Cruz family through his stepmother, as described at the beginning of this chapter.

This baptism in Figure 37.54 proves the connection between Loncke and Coucke. Margareta Vercruysse must have been a de la Cruz, but we could not reveal her roots precisely. Her husband, Joannes Loncke, was the brother of Martina Loncke, wife of Renatus De Poortere, and mother of Antonia de Poortere. The latter married Petrus Prienne, and their daughter, Marie Prienne, married Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08) in 1703. The Loncke family would also marry de Desclergues later on through the marriage of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) and Thérèse Loncke in Wielsbeke in 1840.[2]

37.4.2 On Martina's Ancestors

The father of Martina de la Cruz was Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz. Maria de Montoya, a sister of Felipa de Montoya, was his wife before he married Maria de Sapena, Martina's mother.

For this reason, Martina de la Cruz would marry the grandson of her step-auntie.

Maria De Sapena, or Sopena, Martina's mother, was Don Caspar De Sapena's daughter, a colonel, listed in Figure 37.55, who died during the Siege of Ostend. On February 1, 1598, as shown in Chapter 29.5.25, Caspar Sapena, had endorsed Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) in Mechelen for his qualities as a military, described in Chapter 29.5.25.

The Spanish records show that Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz married Maria de Montoya in Granada on May 8, 1596, in Figure 37.56. Maria de Montoya was born on August 15, 1559, at San Gil y Santa Anna in Granada, the daughter of Pedro de Montoya and Maria Ana Diaz (possibly with Portuguese roots). Pedro de Montoya was born in Navarra and baptized on July 26, 1527, in Santa Maria, Viana, the son of Juan de Montoya and Susana.

So, Martina de la Cruz was Pedro de la Cruz's daughter, or in full, 'Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior.' As a military, he had been stationed chiefly in Northern Belgium, i.e., Antwerp's area to Damme.

Martina's mother was Maria De Sapena.

Martina was born in Dudzele, next to Damme, in 1624, where she is registered with a Spanish name, 'Cruz / Cruys.' In Houtave, between Ostend and Damme, Petrus and Maria married on May 25, 1621.

In San Martin y San Benito El Viejo, Valladolid, Spain, we found the wedding of Domingo Ximenez and Elena de la Cruz on November 19, 1564. Domingo was a son of Miguel Ximenes and Francisca, and Elena was a daughter of Christoval Cuello de la Cruz and Marina de Burgos. Note that Domingo Ximenes was the governor of Nieuwpoort and testified about the military qualities of Enric Desclergue in 1623, as shown in Chapter 33.

Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior was their son and was born probably shortly after 1564.

Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior was first married to Francisca de Lopez. They have lived a while at La Roda in Spain. After Francisca's death, Pedro remarries Maria de Montoya. From that first marriage stemmed a son, Juan Ximenez de la Cruz, who married at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent to Juana Monier on October 5, 1610, in Figure 37.57.

Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior was likely a brother of Lorenço de la Cruz, a Spanish soldier. He died at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent in 1605 and was buried there in December, 'por amor de dios' stated by the priest.

[1] In Sint Eloois Vijve, we also found a person Huyge or Huyse who turns out to be Ximenez; Therefore, perhaps Beatrix Huyge was Beatrix Ximenez. There is no evidence to confirm.

[2] The early connections with Loncke and Prienne are intriguing because the family later married those families. Future genealogists may search for connections between the early ones and the later ones.

His father may have been Juan de la Cruz, who died in Antwerp in 1602, in Figure 37.58.

Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior was married twice to a 'Maria' after his first wife Francisca died. The first was Maria de Montoya, and the second was Maria De Sapena or Sopena, with whom he married, in Figure 37.59, on May 25, 1621, at Houtave.

Pedro had children at the end of the 16th century in Spain before he went to Belgium, then in Antwerp early in the 17th century, followed by more children at Dudzele (including Martina) in the 1620s. At an old age (on April 26, 1635), he married Francisca Fibau at the Spaniard castle of Ghent (witnesses were Guillermo Gra and Juan Ruiz), but we have not retrieved any further children. So, he has married two Francisca's and two Marias.

In Chapter 34 about Antoni Desclergue (DC06), we also find that the family de Orozco was linked to Martina de la Cruz's family, who married Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) at Deerlijk in 1656. Indeed, Martina's full name was Martina Ximenez de la Cruz, where Ximenez was her grandfather's and De la Cruz was her grandmother's.

Martina's cousin, uncle, or father's cousin (we could not find any closer identification) was Joan Jeroni de la Cruz y Orozco, a captain in the Spanish army who lived until 1677. He married Gracia de Bermudez, the daughter of Luis Cordobes y Hurtado de Mendoza and Maria de Melo Cabral y Martin Lozano. A baptism is shown at Harelbeke, in 1650, of Maria Joanna de Benaventa, Dona Anna de Orozco's daughter, in Figure 34.106 on page 557.

There were many Orosco's at the Parish of San Felipe de Castilla in Antwerp decades before.

37.4.3 On Martina's Siblings

In Antwerp, Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior and Maria de Montoya had the following children:

-Juan Ximenes de la Cruz, born in 1601, his godfather was Martino de Santillana, and his godmother was Juana Cantillens;

- Maria Ximenes de la Cruz, born in 1603, her godfather was Jacobo de Coravilla, and her godmother was Digna Vernimé.

Elsewhere, they had the following child:

-Catharina Ximenes de la Cruz was born around 1615.

In Dudzele, Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior and Maria De Sapena had the following children:

-Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz or 'Petrus,' who would have a military career at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent as Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz junior and marry Antonia Sarva. Pedro was born in Dudzele in 1623, and his godfather was Joannes Wterwulghe, his godmother Elisabeth Soppers or de Sapena;

-Martina Ximenes de la Cruz, the person we are focussing on here, was born in Dudzele in 1624. Her godfather was Paulus Deckers, and her godmother was Martina, wife of Jan Declercq (DK03dya). She is described above, at the beginning of Chapter 37.4.

-Lorenzo Ximenes de la Cruz ('Lauretius'), born in Dudzele in 1627, his godfather was Joannes Van Heysterghem, and his godmother Lauretia Rose or Rosa;

-Anna Ximenes de la Cruz, born in Dudzele in 1628, her godfather was Franciscus Soppers or de Sapena, and her godmother Catharina Gheleyns,

-Antonia Ximenes de la Cruz, born in Dudzele in 1630, her godfather was Antonius Vanden Borne, and her godmother Paulina, wife of Jacobus de Meijer,

When stationed in Harelbeke, Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz married Margarita Bucquoy and had the following children baptized in Deerlijk:

- Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz was baptized in Deerlijk on February 7, 1637. His parents were Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. His godparents were Pierre Bucquoy and Anne Frenoo.

-Maria Ximenes de la Cruz was born in Deerlijk on August 24, 1639, as the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. Her godparents were Adrianus de Graeve and Maria Ximenes de la Cruz. The family de Graeve also appears in Figure 48.35 on page 904, in descendants of Martina de la Cruz.

-Margarita Ximenes de la Cruz was born in Deerlijk on January 28, 1641, as the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. Her godparents were Juan Ximenes de la Cruz and Margareta de Gheselle.

-Adriano Ximenes de la Cruz was baptized in Deerlijk on November 16, 1642, as the son of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. The godparents were Adrianus de Beyls and Anna Crommelinx.

The nearest family at that time were their relatives at the Spanish fortification of Sint Eloois Vijve, described in Chapter 37.4.1.

37.4.3.1 Joannes Ximenes de la Cruz

Juan de la Cruz was the son of Petrus and Maria de Montoya. His baptism is shown in Figure 37.60.

37.4.3.2 Maria Ximenes de la Cruz

Maria was the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior and Maria de Montoya and was a half-sister of Martina de la Cruz, our ancestor. She was born in Antwerp in 1603, in Figure 37.61.

37.4.3.3 Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz

Pedro was a son of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior and Maria De Sapena and was Martina de la Cruz's brother. He was born in Dudzele in 1623 and married at Ghent in 1648 to Antoneta Cernes, in Figure 37.62.
We discovered Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz, known as el cabo dequadra, playing a pivotal role as the witness of a momentous wedding on May 14, 1654, at the Spaniard Castle in Gent. The wedding was between Antonio de Montis and Anna Blas, as depicted in Figure 37.63. The other witness was Francisco Garcia. We found several children of Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz and Antoneta Cernes or Sarva: Andres (1649, in Figure 37.64), Margarita (1651, in Figure 37.65), Francisco Felipe (1652, in Figure 37.66), Francisco (1654, in Figure 37.67), Maria Theresia (1657, in Figure 37.68), Balthasar Guillermo (1659, in Figure 37.69) and Juana Margarita (1661, in Figure 37.70). The mother's name appears difficult for the priest because it is written inconsistently: Cernes, Sarva, Cerne, de la Sierra, Ansert, Carida, and Serre.
Antoneta Cernes or Antonia Sarva, wife of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz junior, died in October 1663 at the Spaniard Castle of Gent in Figure 37.71.
On January 18, 1665, Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz married again, in Figure 37.72, when he was already a sergeant, this time to Maria Poitié, at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent. The witnesses were Juan Serrano and Carlos Femina. Maria Poitié was probably Marie Putiers, a local form of Marie Du Puich or Maria Vandeputte, as is explained in Chapter 29.8.3 in the context of the construction of the chapel at Deerlijk.
In 1667, a heart-wrenching tragedy befell Pedro's family, claiming the lives of two of his beloved children, as shown in Figure 37.73. The cause of this devastating loss could have been a disease or the brutalities of warfare. The latter seems more plausible as this was during the devolution war, as detailed in Chapter 8.12.1 and Chapter 34.10.

37.4.3.4 Anna Ximenes de la Cruz

Anna de la Cruz, sister of Martina, married at Gent, in the Spaniard Castle, in 1655, to Juan Alonso del Valle, a soldier, in Figure 37.74.

37.4.3.5 Catarina Ximenes de la Cruz

Catarina was born around 1615 as the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz senior and Maria de Montoya. She was a half-sister of Martina. Her daughter Elizabeth was baptized in 1638 in Antwerp in Figure 37.75.

37.4.3.6 Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz

Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz was baptized in Deerlijk on February 7, 1637, in Figure 37.76. His parents were Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. His godparents were Pierre Bucquoy and Anne Frenoo. The family Frenoo/Frenot also appeared as a witness at Sint Eloois Vijve at the wedding in 1641, in Figure 37.39 on page 653, of Jose Ximenez de la Cruz.

37.4.3.7 Maria Ximenes de la Cruz

Maria Ximenes de la Cruz was born in Deerlijk on August 24, 1639, in Figure 37.77, as the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. Her godparents were Adrianus de Graeve and Maria Ximenes de la Cruz.

37.4.3.8 Margarita Ximenes de la Cruz

Margarita Ximenes de la Cruz was born in Deerlijk on January 28, 1641, in Figure 37.78, as the daughter of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. Her godparents were Juan Ximenes de la Cruz and Margareta de Gheselle.

37.4.3.9 Adriano Ximenes de la Cruz

Adriano Ximenes de la Cruz was baptized in Deerlijk on November 16, 1642, in Figure 37.79, as the son of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz and Marguerite Bucquoy. The godparents were Adrianus de Beyls and Anna Crommelinx. The family de Beyls would reappear later because Joan Declergz (DC08c) would later, in 1688, marry Joanna De Beyls. One of their sons, born in Deerlijk in 1706, would consequently be called 'Adrianus Declercq' (DC08cy3).

37.4.4 An Early Connections Between the de la Cruz and Desclergue Families

As described above, in 1624, when Martina de la Cruz was born, her godmother was Martina, Jan Declercq's (DK03dya) wife, a stepbrother of Antoni Desclergue (DC06). Even earlier, we found a connection between Desclergue and de la Cruz. Indeed, as can be read in Figure 37.82 (or 29.141 on page 430), Juana Desclergue (DC06c), sister of Antoni (DC06), served as godmother to Alonso, a son of Juan Ximenez de la Cruz. This Alonso would marry in 1639, at the place of his baptism, Ana Declerque (DC07e), a daughter of Antoni (DC06), described in Chapter 36.3. This Ana, born in 1621, would, in 1656, become the sister-in-law of Martina de la Cruz.

Ana (DC07e) would later marry again, after Alonso's death, to Juan de Alarcon, a corporal, in 1656 at the Spaniard Castle of Ghent, in Figure 37.80.

37.4.5 Other Relatives of Martina

In 1602, we found Maria de la Cruz in Figure 37.81. Interestingly, the de Tila family also appears in 1644 in Figure 37.111 on page 669.

Juan Ximenes de la Cruz has a son, Alonso, for whom Juana Desclergue (DC06c) served as godmother in 1617, in Figure 37.82. This Alonso would marry in 1639, at the place of his baptism, Ana Declerque (DC07e), explained in Chapter 36.3. Note that this Ana would, in 1656, become the sister-in-law of Martina de la Cruz.

As shown in Chapter 37.4.3.3, before his death, Alonso Ximenes de la Cruz had been a witness on Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz's wedding with Antoneta Cernes or Sarvas, together with Lorenço Fernandez, at the Spaniard Castle of Gent, on June 28, 1648.

Juan Ximenes de la Cruz, the father of Alonso (1617), had two daughters, Margarita (1624) and Magdalena (1629). Their baptism is shown in Figures 37.83 and 37.84.

Martina de la Cruz's father may have had a sister, Margarita de la Cruz. This Margarita married at Damme on April 29, 1614, as 'Margaretha Cruuce' to Charles Varlée, in Figures 37.85 and 37.86. Conrad Beringer ('Conrardus Berryngher'), Joannes de Waghelaere, and Martinus Seynaeve were witnesses.

Margarita de la Cruz appeared in Kortrijk in 1663 as godmother to the child of a Spanish soldier in Figure 37.87.

In the same year, 1667, when Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz, explained above, lost two children, there were many casualties at the Spaniard Castle. For instance, Anna Rustine died on May 16. She was the wife of Juan Durán, who, ten years earlier, served as a witness with Pedro Ximenez de la Cruz on the wedding of Domingo Rey and Maria Schelebeqe on August 17, 1653, at the Spaniard Castle.

We found more records of interest that we could only sometimes situate precisely. They are shown in Figures 37.88, 37.89, 37.90 and 37.91. The latter reveals a link between the Montoya family and De La Cruz.

In Figure 37.92, we find Willem de Ghellinck, husband of Maria Seynave and an acquaintance of Jan Montens and Antoni Desclergue, as described in Chapter 49 about the chapel in Deerlijk and found in the baptism of his daughter Beatrice de Ghellinck at Deerlijk on May 1, 1635, to whom Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), wife of Antoni Desclergue, served as godmother.

The wedding of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz in Figure 37.94, was in 1656 at Deerlijk, Belgium. Don Antoni Declerque's (III) (DC07) father, Don Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), was a witness together with Elizabeth Van Tieghem. Although Martina de la Cruz resided in Deerlijk or Harelbeke with her father, Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz, and stepmother, her nearest family resided in Sint Eloois Vijve at the Spanish fortress. Her witness, Van Tieghem, came from there. Later, she would also have a godparent for one of her children, called 'Tila,' also from Sint Eloois Vijve.

Elizabeth van Tieghem married at Deerlijk in 1649, in Figure 37.95, to Judocus De Meere; witnesses were Bartholomeus De Meere and Anna De Mayer. In 1656, at Deerlijk, Martina Vercruyce was godmother to Petrus De Meere, son of Judocus De Meere and Elizabeth Van Tieghem. We have not found death certificates or wedding certificates in Deerlijk for these De Meeres and Van Tieghems. Probably, they lived only temporarily at Deerlijk, shown in Figure 37.96. There were Vercruysses and Van Tieghems in the area of Deerlijk, but we did not find any connections. Elizabeth Vantieghem likely lived in Sint Eloois Vijve, as we saw this family there, too, in a relationship with the de la Cruz family. For instance, on May 7, 1654, Margareta Van Tieghem served as a Godmother to Carlos Tila ('Carolus Tydthadt'). On March 30, 1651, Judocus Vantieghem served as godfather, again at Sint Eloois Vijve, of David Vermees. Initially, however, Vantieghem likely originated in Kortrijk.

37.6 Their Residence in Ghent during the French Occupation of the Castellany of Kortrijk and the Dutch War (1672-1679)

In Chapter 34.10, we previously introduced Antoni's father, Antoni Desclergue (DC06), focusing on the Kortrijk-Harelbeke-Deerlijk area. Here, we turn our attention to Ghent, where the Desclergue family resided until the city was conquered by Louis XIV of France in 1678. Evidence of their presence and the events during this period is depicted in Figures 37.97 and 37.98.

Throughout this book, the Desclergue family maintains close ties with the Spaniard Castle of Ghent. When the French forces captured the Castellany of Kortrijk, the Desclergues retreated to Ghent, returning only after peace was established. This fragile peace was disrupted by the outbreak of the Dutch War in 1672, which had significant repercussions for the Spanish presence in Ghent.

During this conflict, there were numerous casualties in Ghent, including relatives of Martina de la Cruz, the wife of Antoni Declerque (DC07). As detailed in Chapter 37.4, 1667 was a challenging year for Spanish soldiers in Ghent. Martina de la Cruz lost several relatives, including two descendants of Pedro Ximenes de la Cruz, who died in hostilities between the French and the Spanish near the border between France and the Spanish Netherlands.

The Dutch War (1672-1679) saw the Castellany of Kortrijk under French control. The Spanish allied with the Dutch to repel the French forces.

During this period, the records of Antoni Desclergue (DC06) and his son Antoni Declerque (DC07) disappear, suggesting they fled to Ghent. They remained there until the French forces withdrew in 1679, residing near the Spaniard Castle at Sint Bavo. Notably, the eldest daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz married Juan Garcia in 1676 at the Spaniard Castle (Figure 37.97). Following Garcia's death, she married Joannes de Vos in Harelbeke in 1685.

In 1672, hostilities between France and the Dutch States resumed, with the Spaniards and the Southern Netherlands siding with the Dutch. By autumn 1673, Flanders was engulfed in the war. According to a decree from the French king on March 14-15, 1673, Harelbeke and other regions were required to provide substantial logistical support to reinforce Kortrijk and supply provisions. André Woestijn extensively documents this information in his work on Harelbeke during the Spanish period[3].

In May 1673, King Louis XIV camped near Harelbeke with 46000 French soldiers, positioning his headquarters between Kortrijk and Harelbeke.

The French forces frequently attacked Spanish-held areas, creating significant turmoil. On September 11, 1673, Harelbeke was permitted to confiscate supplies to support French troops, reflecting the strained resources and tensions of the period. By 1676, Harelbeke faced fines and the imprisonment of its officials for withholding Spanish soldiers.

The French and Spanish armies levied contributions, exacerbating the economic strain on local communities. Payments to Spain were made in Ghent, while contributions to the French were made in Kortrijk. The financial burdens and wartime pressures on notable families were immense, with local officials like Rooze and the mayor's son facing imprisonment due to late payments.

In May 1678, Juan de Montoya, a relative of Felipa de Montoya, drowned in the Leie River at Sint Eloois Vijve, an incident detailed in Chapter 29.10.8.1. Around the same time, Pere Declerque (DC07d) had his daughter Juana Felipa Declergz (DC07dx1) baptized in Sint Eloois Vijve during a passage through the village amidst the war.

By November 1678, Harelbeke negotiated the quartering of French soldiers from the Duke of Trymolle, providing supplies to avoid further conflict. Tax records from this period show substantial military expenses, with war costs consuming a significant portion of the city's budget.

Louis XIV's strategic capture of Ghent in 1678 is described in detail by Ronald de Buck[4]. To understand this event, we must consider the broader context of the Franco-Dutch War.

In 1672, France attacked the Dutch Republic, targeting critical cities like Maastricht and Utrecht. Despite initial successes, the French faced setbacks, including the Dutch capture of Bonn in 1673.

By 1677, Louis XIV learned of William III of Orange's marriage to Mary Stuart, positioning him as a future King of England. To preemptively weaken the Dutch, Louis XIV aimed to capture Ghent, a strategic and economic hub. He orchestrated diversions by besieging Ypres and Saint-Ghislain, spreading Spanish forces thin and leaving Ghent vulnerable.

Ghent's defense, led by Francisco de Pardo with just 500 men, was quickly overwhelmed by a French force of 67 battalions and 84 cavalry squadrons. The French siege began on March 3, 1678, and the city surrendered on March 9. Despite efforts to flood the surrounding areas, Ghent's defenses crumbled under the French onslaught, and the Spaniard Castle held out only slightly longer.

Following the capture, the French occupation pressured the Dutch into signing a separate peace treaty at Nijmegen on August 10, 1678. The Spanish followed suit on September 17, ending the conflict and allowing the Desclergue family to return to their homes.

As detailed in Chapter 34.11, Antoni Desclergue (DC06) visited Montblanc for a wedding in 1679, although it is unclear if his son Antoni (DC07) accompanied him.

The detailed account of Ghent's capture by J. E. Neve[5] highlights the recurring nature of French occupations in Flanders. By 1680, the Spanish military presence around Kortrijk was evident again, as shown in Figure 37.99.

This historical narrative underscores the tumultuous period the Desclergue family endured and provides a comprehensive understanding of their movements and challenges during the late 17th century.

37.7 The French Raid of 1681-1685

As chronicled by André Woestijn in his work [6], the late 17th century was a tumultuous period for Harelbeke. In 1681, French forces from the garrisons of Menin and Ypres looted the municipalities of Ingelmunster and Harelbeke. This led to the extended guarding of Harelbeke for four additional months between 1681 and 1682. On December 2, 1681, French troops captured key civic leaders, including the bailiff, provost, mayor, and alderperson in Menin, Cambrai, and Lille. The city made a lump sum payment for their release. However, it wasn't until July 13, 1685, that the town and parish sought compensation from Spain's intendant for the French reprisal of 1681, indicating the city's ongoing struggle.

On March 5, 1682, a loan of £150 was granted to the city. By September 4, 1683, the situation had deteriorated further as French troops under Duke De Boufflers occupied Harelbeke, destabilizing the surrounding countryside. That same month, after a Te Deum service in Kortrijk (which had not yet fallen into French hands), armed civilians moved outside the new gate (Gentpoort next to the citadel) and discharged large artillery on the French forces in Harelbeke.

The military actions escalated on November 3, 1683, when a significant French army of 40000 men, led by Marshal d'Humières, approached Kortrijk, forcing its surrender by November 4. Only the citadel of Kortrijk remained under Spanish control, but it, too, fell on November 6. Kortrijk would remain under French occupation until 1685.

On November 13, a report by Velhoen and Theodore Corture detailed the extensive war damage in Harelbeke. The Grote Kalseide road was destroyed, its sides eroded by the prolonged presence of French troops and heavy rains. Additional mud was used to reinforce the edges. Three wells were demolished, the lead gutter from the town hall was stolen by soldiers, and many roof slates were shattered. The Leiestraat turned into a mud puddle, worsened by horses going to drink at the horse trough, which was also damaged.

In response to these calamities, the inhabitants began selling furniture stolen and abandoned by soldiers. The dire conditions and the theft of much of the church's silverware and ornaments prompted the city to borrow 6000 guilders, for which the bishop granted permission on May 17, 1686.

During this period, the city also experienced additional raids. On May 23, 1684, some Spaniards raided the houses of Proost Van Cauteren and Canon Vercruysse at 3 a.m., taking them as prisoners to Ghent. Between 1683 and 1685, Harelbeke required guarding for another 119 days.

There were also reports of cattle disease in and around Harelbeke. On August 11, 1685, the church's chalices and sacred vessels were stolen and never recovered. In 1685 and 1686, Harelbeke continued to experience problems with soldiers from the regiment of Baron Saint-Jean and Simon Vandenbulke, causing disturbances, notably in Adriaen Lemayeur's inn D' halve Maan.

The Peace of Regensburg concluded on August 16, 1686, and finally brought a semblance of reconciliation. During this period, Antoni Declerque (DC07) is believed to have appeared as a witness at the wedding of a Monroy distant relative in Ghent in 1686, an event illustrated in Figure 37.100.

This historical account of Harelbeke during the Spanish period underscores the severe impact of military conflicts on local communities. It highlights the resilience and challenges faced by its inhabitants amidst the broader geopolitical struggles of the era.

37.8 The Nine Year War of 1688-1697

André Woestijn's valuable work[7] provides a detailed account of the turbulent period during the Nine Years' War (1688-1697), highlighting the significant impact on the castellany of Kortrijk and, particularly, Harelbeke. Despite its indirect involvement, the region faced numerous challenges, including military encampments, contributions to occupying forces, and widespread looting and destruction.

The Nine Years' War began in 1688, resulting in extensive troop movements and encampments in the Castellany of Kortrijk. Although the region remained relatively quiet compared to other areas, it was compelled to contribute to Spanish and French forces due to its occupied status. On April 21, 1689, the chapter of Harelbeke was informed of the renewed hostilities between France and Spain, leading to the suspension of council meetings the following day. Subsequently, the church's most valuable documents were relocated to Kortrijk and Ghent for safekeeping.

In August 1689, the Allied forces of Spain, Bavaria, Germany, Savoy, and the Dutch States camped near Kortrijk, imposing significant burdens on Harelbeke's citizens for provisions. From September 1-5, 1689, the Allies occupied the home of Rogier Decock, the city's clerk, who later sought compensation for storing tents and supplying firewood and straw. During this period, Joos Boudré was on guard duty for 127 days due to the threat of 'roguish' individuals.

The Allies departed on June 15, 1690, only to be replaced by French troops under Marshal d'Humières, who demanded forage and horses from Ingelmunster Castle. On June 20, 1690, Marshal d'Humières left Harelbeke for Oostrozebeke, leaving behind seven burnt houses, including notable inns such as the French Shield ('Het Frans Schild') and the Swan ('De Zwaan').

French forces continued to pose a threat, exemplified by the looting at Heule on September 25, 1692, and subsequent actions to protect church property. On October 28, 1692, the council decided to use the choir and crypt of St. Peter's for storing clergy furniture, while the Chapel of Our Lady was reserved for chaplains.

In January 1693, a division under Duke de Villars briefly occupied Harelbeke, demolishing houses for firewood before leaving. By July 21, 1693, the existing bridges were destroyed by order of Vauban, necessitating the construction of a new bridge, which fell into disrepair by 1695, leading the council to implement a ferry service.

The situation remained unstable through 1694, with the Count of Luxembourg's troops camping in the region and requiring preservation letters to safeguard the church and refugees' furniture. The town and chapter sought a Sauvegarde from the French Duke de Luxembourg, and war expenditures constituted a significant portion of the city's budget. The town imposed fees on strangers seeking refuge with their animals to offset the costs.

In late August 1694, French soldiers occupied the Harlembois estate, engaging in widespread looting. By October 15, 1694, the Allied army's withdrawal from Kruishoutem indicated the imminent departure of the French forces.

On January 25, 1696, Harelbeke reported significant losses to the castellany of Kortrijk, including damage to property and supplies provided to Marshal de Villeroy's guards. Serious arson incidents occurred in 1696 and 1697, adding to the town's woes. On Saint Hubert Day, Betken Stalins was killed in the church, highlighting the pervasive violence.

In July 1697, the French De Catinat garrison caused further damage before departing for Kortrijk. The Peace of Rijswijk, signed on September 20, 1697, temporarily ended the conflict, with France ceding the Southern Netherlands to Austria. However, the peace was short-lived, and the region would soon face new challenges.

In 1698, the bridge in Harelbeke, previously demolished by French troops under Marshal Boufflers' orders, was repaired, marking a small step towards recovery.

The Nine Years' War had a profound impact on Harelbeke and its surroundings, with the region enduring significant hardships, including military occupation, economic strain, and widespread destruction. Woestijn's meticulous documentation provides invaluable insight into this tumultuous period, highlighting the resilience and fortitude of the local population in the face of relentless conflict.

37.9 Their Offspring

Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz had the following children:

Joanna Declercgz (DC08b) (1657), Joan Declercgz (DC08c) (1661), Maria Declercgz (DC08d) (1665), Maria Catherina Declercgz (DC08e) (1669) (She died at Deerlijk in 1684) and Pere (DC08) (1673).

So, Martine Vercruyce (de la Cruz), born in 1624, married in 1656 at the age of 32, and had five children from 1657, at the age of 33, one every four years, until 1673, at the age of 49[8]. Furthermore, she appears as a witness on her adult children's certificates until 1693 at 69.

Her children's godfathers were, respectively, Don Antoni Desclergue (II) (DC06), Abraham Veriest, Bartholomeus De Meere, Pere Declerque (DC07d), and Charles Vercruysse.

Their Godmothers were Joanna Suchet or Sucaet, who probably had Spanish roots, Elizabeth De Lara, Maria Declercq (DK03dybx2 or DK03dybx5), Catherine Vanwinsberghe and Maria Declercq (DK03dybx2 or DK03dybx5).

One intriguing aspect in the list of godfathers and godmothers is Charles Vercruysse (also mentioned in Chapter 37.4.1) and Elizabeth de Lara. Besides Charles Vercruysse's and Martina Vercruyce's shared names, we have not found any links. What's particularly interesting is that Charles Vercruysse's godson was named Pere, instead of Charles, which could be due to the parents' desire to name the child after Pere Declerque (DC07d) or Pere Desclergue (DC01).

37.9.1 Maria Catarina Declercgz (DC08e)

Maria Catarina Declercgz (DC08e) was the daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz.
The baptism of Maria Catarina Declercgz (DC08e) is documented in Figure 37.102.
In Chapter 34.12.3, we described how the father of Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx), Noel, remarried after the death of Beatrice's mother to Elisabetha Vanwynsberghe at Zwevegem in 1607. Therefore, we assume that Catharina Vanwinsberghe or Vanwynsberghe, who appeared as godmother on the baptism in Figure 37.102, was a Beatrice Declercq (DK02byx)'s step-family member.
Maria Catarina Declergz (DC08e) married at Gent, at the Spaniard Castle, to Pedro Masse ('Petrus du Maes') on September 29, 1706, in Figure 37.103. Likely, Pedro Masse did not come from Spain but descended from Spanish and, therefore, probably spelled his name as Du Maes or Maes and no longer Masse or Massa. The witnesses were Dominico Fernandez and Isabelle Gutierre. Note that there were many Gutieres a century before at San Felipe de Castilla in Antwerp, and we also found some in Harelbeke-Kortrijk.

37.9.2 Maria Declercgz (DC08d)

Maria Declercgz (DC08d) was the daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz. Her baptism is shown in Figure 37.104.
Maria Declercgz married Egidius Du Puich in 1701. The baptism of a son with his first wife is shown in Figure 37.105. The Desclergues knew Egidius Du Puich. Joana Catharina Declercgz (DC08b) served as a witness on his first wedding in 1697. After his first wife's death, Egidus married Joana Catharina's sister Maria (DC08d) in 1701 in Figure 37.106.
Du Puich / Dupuis / Vandeputte's family, as can be found in Chapter 49, was involved with a Chapel's construction at Deerlijk through their ancestors, which shows that this family and the Declercgz family were acquainted. It is, therefore, not surprising that a marriage between both would occur.
Indeed, the French word 'Puits' used to be written without a t until the 16th century and was spelled as 'Puz, Puis, Puiz, Puich'; therefore, the French names of Dupuis/Du Puich and the Flemish name Vandeputte are the same and may have been exchanged depending on location and priest. As shown in Chapter 36.4, we also found a link between the De Puich family and Beatrice de Pinto's appearance. This interconnection is consistent with everything described in this book.
Egidius Vandeputte (Gilles Dupuis / du Puich) was born at Harelbeke on July 1, 1663. He was the son of Mathias Vandeputte (Mathieu Dupuis / du Puich) and Joanna Van Rumbeke. His godmother was Isabeau Du Bois ('Elizabeth Vanhoute') and his godfather was Egidius Vandenberghe.
The record in Figure 37.106 shows that he married Maria Declercgz (DC08d) in Harelbeke in 1701, daughter of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina Vercruyce. The witnesses were Jacobus Callens, Charles Pattyn, and Joanna Declercgz (DC08b). Jacobus Calles was related to the Vandeputte (Du Puich) family. When Mathias Vandeputte (Du Puich) married Joanna Van Rumbeke in Harelbeke in 1662, witnesses were Egidius Vanberghe and the custode. Charles Pattyn was related to Magdalena Vanoutryve, the first wife of Egidius Du Puich.
Egidus's mother, Joanna Van Rumbeke, born at Harelbeke on November 16, 1627, had first been married to Carolus Callens on January 26, 1649, at Harelbeke, and had the following children: Jacobus Callens in 1649 and Joanna Callens in 1652. Interestingly, as found in Chapter 48.3, the families Van Rumbeke, Callens and Vandeputte also appear in the ecclesiastic records of Maria Declercgz (DC08d), sister Joana Catharina Declergz (DC08b), who married Joannes de Vos. It is essential in exposing the family bonds of de Vos's descendants, described in Part X because their son Petrus de Vos was orphaned at the age of 11 and raised in Hulste with the Maes family, which means he was relatively disconnected from the rest of the family.
Equally important is the observation that Joanna Van Rumbeke was a daughter of Jacobus Van Rumbeke and Catharina Valcke and was a sister of Petrus Van Rumbeke (1629-1692), Joannes Van Rumbeke (1632), Judocus Van Rumbeke (1634), Jacobus Van Rumbeke (1636), Maria Magdalena Van Rumbeke (1638), Catharina Van Rumbeke (1641), Margarita Van Rumbeke (1643) and Nicolaus Van Rumbeke (1645).
Joanna's father, Jacobus Van Rumbeke, died in 1645 and was a brother of Joanna Van Rumbeke (1588-1615), who was married to Thomas Bekaert on February 19, 1612. The connection with the family Bekaert is meaningful in the context of Antoni Desclergue's (DC06) relationships and his involvement in establishing a chapel in Deerlijk as described in Chapter 49, in particular, Chapter 49.5 and Chapter 49.2.2; and Chapter 34.

37.9.3 Joanna Catharina Declercgz (DC08b)

Joanna Catarina Declercgz (DC08b) was the daughter of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz. Her baptism is shown in Figure 37.111. The reader can find most information about her in Chapter 48.3. Her descendants formed the 'de Vos' branch, which the author also descends from along his mother's side. She first married a Spanish soldier, Juan Garcia, in 1676 in Figure 37.112, while the family resided in Ghent, as can be read in Chapter 37.6. Later, she married Joannes De Vos of a family that was likely rooted in Spain and was well connected to the Desclergues and Montoya.

The marriage of Joanna Catharina Declercgz (DC08b) with Joannes De Vos and a description of their descendants can be found in Part X.

37.9.4 Joan Declercgz (DC08c)

Joan Declercgz (DC08c) was the son of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz.

He married Joanna De Beyls at Deerlijk in 1688, in Figure 37.114. Witnesses were his father, Antoni Desclergue (III) (DC07), and also Juanna Amaya ('Hamaye'). Antoni (DC07) also served as godfather to their firstborn child Antoni at Deerlijk in 1688, while Juana Amaya ('Hamaye') would be godmother. In 1697, their son Petrus Declercq was born at Deerlijk; the godfather was Joan De Beyls, and the godmother was Martine Vercruyce (de la Cruz). In 1700, their daughter Maria Catharina Declercq was born in Deerlijk but baptized in Harelbeke and the godfather was Adrianus Degezelle, and the godmother was Maria Declercgz (DC08d). In 1702, their daughter Petronilla Declercq was born at Deerlijk; the godfather was Pere Declercgz (DC08), and the godmother was Catharina De Beyls. In 1706, their son Adrianus Declercq was born; the godfather was Adrianus Declercq (DK03dyay1y2), and the godmother was Judoca De Beyls. In 1612, their daughter Maria Theresia Declercq was born at Deerlijk. The godfather was Pere Declercgz (DC08), and the godmother was Joanna Naessens.

Note that Amaya is a Spanish name and that a similar variant exists in Flemish: Ameye. The priest spelled her name very unusually, namely 'Hamaye.' Although we do not believe she was Spanish, it is still worth mentioning that it is possible because (de) Amaya is a Spanish name.

Juana Amaya married Stephanus Debels at Deerlijk in 1644; one of their children, born in 1655, was also named Stephanus Debels. On her wedding certificate, her name is spelled as 'Joanna Amaye'; witnesses were Adriano Debels and Livina Baudens (who married Adrianus Debels in Vichte, shown in Figure 37.115, in 1639).

Weirdly, there appear to be no witnesses from Joanna Amaya's family, and we have yet to find any birth certificate that could belong to her. In the period 1655-1690, in Deerlijk, we see a cluster of people called either Hamaye or Amaye on church certificates, and simultaneously we find groups of people called Ameye. So clearly, the priest during that period made a difference, i.e., Amaya/Hamaya was, to the priest, not equal to Ameye.

Joanna Debels was born (as Joanna Debeldts) in Deerlijk in 1664, the daughter of Stephanus Debels (Debeldts) and Joanna Amaye. Her godfather was Georgius Verscheure, and her godmother was Catharina Amaye. At Deerlijk and Harelbeke, there is more than one Catharina Ameye, and we have yet to identify with certainty if one of them is the one mentioned as godmother.

Their childrens' baptisms are shown in Figures 37.116, 37.117, 37.118, 37.119, 37.120, and 37.121.

37.9.4.1 Joan Declercgz (DC08c) on the List of 'La Bourgeoisie Foraine' of Kortrijk at Deerlijk

His found entries on the list are shown in Figures 37.122, 37.123, 37.124, 37.125, 37.126, 37.127, 37.128, 37.129, 37.130, 37.131, 37.132, 37.133, 37.134, and 37.135.

Pere Declercgz (DC08) was the son of Antoni Declerque (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz. He is our ancestor and is described in Chapter 38.

Chapter 38

Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08) & Marie Prienne

38.1 Introduction

His complete name was Don Pere Declercgz de la Cruz (DC08), and he was the first patrilineal ancestor to integrate deeply into the local society. As far as we have studied, the marriage between Pere Declercgz (DC08) and Marie Prienne must indeed have been the first actual consolidation of our patrilineal ancestors in Flanders. Marie Prienne was a member of the Loncke family, who were farmers, and although she may have had some ancestors with roots south of the language border in Flanders, we consider her, by all means, a typical Flemish bride. Their area also became increasingly disconnected from Spain due to France's imminent threat and the transition toward an Austrian regime.

Pere Declercgz's (DC08) father's generation was the last one with close connections to the Spanish military, as was shown earlier. With Pere (DC08), a new dawn arose for the family, free of military involvement and deeper integration into the local society, one century after the first arrival in Flanders. The couple married almost 100 years after the death of Jeroni (DC05). Therefore, the importance of family history in Spain and the Siege of Ostend were long gone.

Nevertheless, the family preserved the memory and would even a few generations later apply the name 'Hof van Brussel' to their farm in Wielsbeke, referring to the Spanish seat in Belgium at the Palace of the Koudenberg in Brussels, where, nowadays, the Royal Palace is located, shown in Figure 38.4 on page 677.

We refer to (DC08) as Pere Declercgz, remembering that he descended from that Catalan family in Montblanc, although he probably called himself Pierre or Pieter.

38.2 Don Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08)

Don Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08) was born in 1673 at Deerlijk, Belgium, as the son of Don Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina de la Cruz, locally known as Vercruyce, as seen on his baptism in Figure 38.1. He was a Doncel because he was born under the Spanish regime.

He was not named after his Godfather, Charles Vercruysse, but after his father's brother in the military, Pere Desclergue (DC07d). The absence of the latter during the baptism of our ancestor Pere Declercgz (DC08) is described in Chapter 36.7.

His godmother was Maria Declerque (DC07b). The latter is significant because she had been married to Rafael Juan de Pedrolo from Valls, Spain, in 1651. She had returned to Flanders due to her husband's military involvement or because she was already widowed.

Note that on the baptism in Figure 38.1, the priest has used an unusual, for Deerlijk, spelling for Pere Declercgz (DC08): 'De cleerk,' i.e., somewhat close to 'Desclergue.' Nobody else at Deerlijk was registered as such. Unlike his father's generation, firmly embedded in the Spanish regime, Pere Declercgz's (DC08) generation lived in the Austrian administration period and were civilians who were, as far as we know, no longer involved in any military activity.

38.3 Marie Prienne

She was the wife of Don Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08).

She was born, in Figure 38.2, in 1678 in Harelbeke, Belgium, as a daughter of Pierre Prienne, who died in July 1693 at Harelbeke, and Antonia de Poortere, who was born at Deerlijk in 1645 as the daughter of Renatus de Poortere and Martine Loncke; and who died on January 5, 1710, at Harelbeke.

Her Godfather was Mathias De Poortere, and her Godmother was Maria Gillot, daughter of Arnold Gillot from Harelbeke.

Marie's brother was Olivier Prienne (1675). She also had sisters Catharina (1673) and Elisabeth (1684).

She was most likely the first bride in the family who may be considered as typically Flemish. From this point forward, the family was more integrated into the local community, involved in education, trade, and farming, and no longer in the military as far as we could figure out.

Interestingly, the family Prienne may have been acquainted with de Montoya, as indicated in Chapter 29.10.12.3.

38.4 Their Marriage

Their wedding, in Figure 38.3, was in 1703, in Harelbeke, Belgium. The marriage witnesses were Egidius Van de Putte, or Du Puich (the son of Mathias Van de putte and Joanna Van Rumbeke), and Antonia de Poortere, Marie Prienne's mother.

38.5 Spanish Succession War (1701-1713)

In the introduction of this manuscript, we extensively described the succession problem, namely in Chapter 8.12.2. The wedding between Don Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08) and Marie Prienne occurred at Harelbeke in 1703 amid this war. To get a better idea of the local consequences in the area where they resided, we refer again to André Woestijn's book[1].

The War of the Spanish Succession (1701–1714) began after the death of the Spanish king Charles II on November 1, 1700. Without a direct heir, the Spanish throne was granted to Philip of Anjou, the grandson of Louis XIV of France. This inheritance raised fears among European powers about the potential for a united Franco-Spanish empire that could dominate Europe. On December 4, 1700, Philip placed the Spanish Netherlands under the tutelage of his grandfather, Louis XIV.

Subsequently, on March 9, 1701, Louis XIV concluded a treaty with Elector Maximilian Emmanuel of Bavaria, who ruled the Netherlands for ten years. However, Maximilian left the management to the governor, Marquis de Bedmar.

The war brought immediate demands and disruptions to the local populace. On January 4, 1702, Dela Cubba, Marquis de Bedmar, ordered the Castellany of Kortrijk to supply 370 men for the army before the end of January. The locals, however, were unwilling to become soldiers. On January 14, the commander expressed his concern to Harelbeke that several young men had married to escape conscription. Hence, he determined that all young men married since January 1 be selected, and their wives should not join them. Harelbeke managed to supply two soldiers, Jacobus Vandendriessche and Pieter Loosfelt.

On April 6, Harelbeke and Waregem were again charged with finding one soldier for De la Faille's battalion. Pieter Herbe was selected, and Harelbeke and Waregem each had to pay half of his salary.

On May 15, 1702, Austria, England, and the United Provinces declared war on France and Spain to prevent the establishment of a Franco-Spanish empire. That same month, 60000 French soldiers crossed the northern border of the Southern Netherlands.

By 1704, English troops were present in Harelbeke, as evidenced by local church death registers. For instance, Catharina Bevemaege, the widow of Simoen Veys, died on October 2, 1704, but was buried only the next day because English soldiers occupied the cemetery.

On May 19, 1706, the Duke of Marlborough, John Churchill, arrived in Flanders. He defeated the French forces under de Villeroy at the Battle of Ramillies and subsequently conquered Ostend, Menen, Dendermonde, and Ath. On June 20, 600 Englishmen led by Cadegan, quartermaster general of Marlborough's army, camped from Harelbeke to Sint-Eloois-Vijve. The city provided four barrels of wine to the commander, and some soldiers camped near the watermill.

From October 20-31, 1706, eleven Harelbeke pioneers worked on fortifications in Kortrijk, with an additional four from November 10-23. In February 1707, Robert Murray reported that Harelbeke had supplied 2000 palisades, 4185 burgesses, 603 bundles of straw, and 127 pounds of soot candles for fortifying Kortrijk.

The war continued to burden the local population. On November 22, 1706, Harelbeke and ten surrounding municipalities applied for exemption from subsidies due to war-related contributions and exhaustion. By 1707, Harelbeke-Buiten supplied horses, soldiers, forage, and pioneers for various regiments lodged within the city.

In September 1707, Harelbeke was sacked by the Allied armies of Marlborough. A loss statement documented significant theft and damage to property, including linen, meat, grains, tobacco, and furniture. Local authorities, including the monastery superior Mattheus Carpentier and bailiff Pieter vanden Berghe, complained about looting by Marlborough's troops. They requested protection for the city, church, and monastery.

The winter of 1708-1709 was notably harsh. On October 5, 1708, soldiers camped at the windmill and demolished the De Wolf chapel. That same year, Jacobus Goemaere transported grain to the English army in Lille, and residents assisted with transport and repairs.

On January 20, 1709, the combined armies of Marlborough, Prince Eugene of Savoy, and the Duke of Württemberg set up camp in Harelbeke and the surrounding area for 110000 men. Throughout 1711, various requisitions and contributions were made to support the military efforts.

The protracted conflict concluded with the Peace of Utrecht, signed on April 11, 1713. This treaty ended hostilities between France and the Grand Alliance, which included Britain, the Dutch Republic, and the Holy Roman Empire. The French evacuated Ypres, Veurne, and Diksmuide. Despite the peace, the aftermath of the war included the disadvantageous 'Barelentraktaat' of 1714, which entailed Dutch military occupation and the economic burdens imposed on the Belgians, including the closure of the Scheldt and the allocation of Belgium to Austria. This treaty marked the end of Spanish rule in the region and ushered in a period of Austrian control.

The War of the Spanish Succession profoundly impacted Harelbeke, as documented in various records. From conscription and supply requisitions to occupation and looting by foreign troops, the war brought significant hardships to the local populace. The eventual peace treaties reshaped the political landscape, ending Spanish dominance and imposing new challenges under Austrian rule. These events are crucial for understanding the broader socio-political transformations in Flanders during this turbulent period.

Chapter 39

Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) & Marie Montaigne

39.1 Introduction

Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) is a patrilineal ancestor. The river, known as Golden River, used to form a formidable barrier for the citizens of the south of West-Flanders in terms of seeking partners. Joan Declercq (DC09) and Marie Montaigne brought our ancestors across the Leie River to the left banks while they lived on the right bank (Kortrijk-Harelbeke-Deerlijk) before.

The family consequently continued to marry partners and live on the left bank until, in the 20th century, Michel Declercq (DC15), born at Wielsbeke, and Irma Lesage, born in Moorslede, decided to move the family back to Deerlijk.

39.2 Don Joan Declercq (II) (DC09)

He was the last Desclergue born in Belgium during the Spanish Netherlands period. We remind the reader of his ancestors in Figure 39.1. According to Spanish tradition, his complete name was Don Joan Declercq y Prienne (II) (DC09), and he would seize to comport significance as soon as the government changed to Austrian rule. Joan (DC09) was born in 1706, in Deerlijk, Belgium, as the son of Pere Declercq (DC11) and Marie Prienne, as seen in Figure 39.2. His Godfather was Joan Declercq (DC11c), and his Godmother was Elizabeth Prienne.

Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) died in Kuurne in 1772, in Figure 39.3, where the priest indicated that he was born in Deerlijk and exposed his age. Because genealogy is investigated in reverse order, the document was a giant leap forward in our investigation many years ago.

When Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) was eight years old, on September 11, 1714, the link with Catalonia in Spain became definitively broken, and a new world would arise for him and his descendants. During the war of succession in Europe, Catalonia had not chosen the Bourbon side, which led to a disaster for the region and its rights. The Army of Catalonia initially fought in support of the Habsburg dynasty's claim to the Spanish throne, a decision which, in principle, meant that they were loyal to the noble family that had for a long time ruled Spain. They would finally be defeated at the Siege of Barcelona by the army of the Bourbon King, H.M. Philip V of Spain, on September 11, 1714, after 14 months of siege. It meant the loss of the Catalan constitutions, the institutional system, and independence within the federation of Aragon and the Principality of Catalonia under the aegis of the Nueva Planta decrees and the realm of Spain. We assume that since then, the Declercq or the Desclergues no longer took any title of nobility, even not the title of Doncel or Mosen, because, with Catalonia, they probably lost all privileges linked to their region of origin. Don Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) died in 1772 in Kuurne, Belgium.

Joan Declercq (DC12) had a brother, Maximilien Declercq (DC12b), a shop owner at Kuurne, married to Barbara Thérèse Bostoen.

39.3 Marie Montaigne

She was born in 1711 in Kuurne, Belgium, before October 21, as induced from her death certificate in Figure 39.4. She appears on the name list of baptisms in 1711, but the original record (page nr 93) is lost. She died in 1775 at Kuurne, Belgium. Her family name is sometimes spelled as Monteyne.

Marie Montaigne is François Montaigne's daughter (who died at Kuurne in 1742) and Maria Blomme ('Bloeme'). She had a sister, Godelieve Montaigne (born at Kuurne in 1708), married to Renier Deyghere. Renier was the Godfather of Marie Montaigne's son Renier Declercq (DC10). Marie Montaigne's mother, Marie Blomme, died in 1718 in Kuurne, after which Franciscus Montaigne remarried Theresia Amaya in August 1718 at Kuurne. Unfortunately, Franciscus's wife, Theresia, would die in 1724 in Kuurne.

For her siblings, we find Godfathers Jacques Montaigne, Guillelmus Bossuyt, Guillelmus Tanghe, Gilles Blomme, Jean Montaigne; and as godmothers Marie Michiels, Marina Blomme, Marie de Laere, Petronella Montaigne, Godelieve Montaigne, Jeanne Descamps.

We have not found indications of a foreign origin or links to foreigners in her of previous generations. We may conclude, despite the French family name, that she was a typical Flemish person.

Their wedding occurred in 1734 at Kuurne, Belgium, in Figure 39.5.

Apart from Renier Declercq (DC10), the couple also had a son Petrus Joseph born at Kuurne in 1735, in Figure 39.8. The godfather was Pere Declercgz (DC08), the godmother was Marie Lippens.

In fact, Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio was the daughter of Ana de Villavicencio, who died in 1537 and was raised by her aunt Brianda de Villavicencio.

Figure 39.9: 'Hof van Brussel' , the Palace of Coudenberg, by Jan Brueghel the Younger, around 1627. Not only have we found traces of the Desclergues there, but the Desclergues also used to call their farm 'Hof van Brussel' until the 20th century.

39.6 The Total Destruction of 'Hof van Brussel' in 1731

The Hof van Brussel, also known as the Palace of Koudenberg or Het Paleis op de Koudenberg, was a prominent palace in Brussels, serving as the seat of Spanish governance. This palace was the last physical link between the Desclergues family and their Spanish heritage, leading them to name their farm Hof van Brussel in remembrance. This farm name persisted in Wielsbeke until the 20th century.

The actual Hof van Brussel was an architectural marvel, depicted in Figure 39.9. Its initial construction began in the 11th and 12th centuries in an area known as Koudenberg, which corresponds to the present-day Koningsplein. Over the centuries, the palace evolved and expanded, becoming the residence of the dukes of Brabant and Burgundy and, later, significant figures such as Emperor Charles V and the Spanish governors Albrecht and Isabella.

The palace holds notable historical significance as the site where Charles V abdicated in favor of his son, Felipe II, who became His Majesty, the King of the Spanish territories and the Netherlands. During Felipe II's reign, Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) was born and eventually migrated to Belgium.

Tragically, the palace was destroyed by a fire in 1731 during the governorship of Maria Elisabeth of Austria. Despite its destruction, the historical footprint of the palace endures. For instance, we have documented the baptism of a daughter of Enric Desclergue (DC05c) at the Church of Saint Jacob at Koudenberg, located on the palace grounds. This event is illustrated in Figure 33.36 on page 517.

The palace's architectural and political legacy remains vital to Brussels' rich history, reflecting the intertwined fates of the local nobility and the broader European political landscape.

Chapter 40

Renier Declercq (DC10) & Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde

40.1 Introduction

The generation of Renier Declercq is situated in the second half of the 18th century, more than 150 years after our Spanish ancestors arrived in the region along the Leie River. As outlined above, the Desclergues remained in contact with descending Spanish individuals throughout the 17th century.

This chapter describes what we have found about Renier Declercq's life (DC10), and it turns out that he married a Flemish bride, Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde. Her ancestors, however, had valuable contacts with Spanish inhabitants at Harelbeke.

Therefore, the community of Spanish descendants and their connections must have been meaningful realities that influenced the younger generations and their marital choices.

Through Renier (DC10) and Marie Anne Thérèse, the family established ties in Heule, Hulste, and Izegem. The link with Heule would later play a role in the closeness with writers in the 19th and early 20th centuries, mentioned in subsequent chapters.

40.2 Renier Declercq (DC10), Sometimes also Referred to as René Declercq

Renier Declercq (DC10) was born in 1740 in Kuurne, Belgium, as the son of Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) and Marie Montaigne. His godfather was Renier Deyghere, and his godmother was Petronilla Lamelin, as seen in Figure 40.2. He was married to Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde and was a merchant and farmer. He died in 1808 at Lendelede, in Figure 40.3.

Because the Spanish period ended in 1715 and there was opposition from around 1700 related to the Spanish succession wars, we may expect that the family no longer highlighted the Spanish roots. The memory faded away from this generation onward.

Nevertheless, as shown in the introduction, the connections cherished by the family were still somewhat related to their foreign roots. New adaptations are, for instance, reflected in the given name.

Indeed, Renier or Rainer was rather famous in Austria. Therefore, Belgium was already oriented towards the Habsburg reign in Austria instead of Spain.

In this book, to maintain a warm influence by Spain and, in particular, Catalonia, we name Renier's siblings according to the Catalan version of their names. Renier Declercq (DC10) had a brother, Pere Josep Declercq (DC10b), born at Kuurne in 1735, whose godfather was Pere Declercq (DC09c), and godmother Maria Lippens. His younger brothers were FelipeJaume Declercq (DC10c), born in Kuurne in 1746, and Domènec Declercq (DC10d), born in Kuurne in 1745.

Renier Declercq (DC10) was a farmer and a flax merchant who lived in Kuurne (in the 1740s), Emelgem and Izegem (in the 1770s), and Lendelede (in the 1790s until he died in 1808).

From the author's viewpoint, his mobility was extraordinary before discovering foreign roots.

Indeed, most bloodlines typically resided for many generations in the same village. Having ancestors who were not sedentary but still relatively wealthy and involved in farming and trade triggered curiosity and resulted in all the previous chapters provided in this book.

40.3 Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde

Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde was born in 1750 in Hulste, Belgium. Her parents were Pierre Joseph Lombaerde and Brigitte Samyn, as shown in Figure 40.4. She was the wife of Renier Declercq (DC13).

Anyone interested in further investigating the Lombaerde bloodline should be careful. Indeed, another contemporary, Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde, lived in Hulste and was baptized in Hulste on December 25, 1749 (daughter of François Lombaerde and Marie Anne Samyn; the godfather was Philippe Charles Lemayeur, and the godmother Josine Vercamen) and who may have been a cousin.

Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde remarried after the death of Renier Declercq (DC13), and she died in Lendelede in 1812 in Figure 40.6.

We can extract some facts about the parents of Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde from the certificate of her second marriage, shown in Figure 40.5. On July 27, 1809, at Lendelede, Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde, who lived at Lendelede but was born at Hulste on April 8, 1750, widow, married Joseph Vanden Broucke, a widower. He resided at Lendelede but was born in Heule on March 17, 1741. The groom's parents were Guillaume Vanden Broucke, who died at Lendelede on May 24, 1787, and Elisabeth Deryckere, who died at Lendelede on May 5, 1791. The bride's parents were Pierre Joseph Lombardi, who died at Kuurne on January 17, 1782, and Brigitte Samyn, who died at Kuurne on January 28, 1776. The groom had previously been married to Marie Jeanne Bossuyt, while the bride had earlier been married to Renier Declercq ('René Declercq') (DC10).

Interestingly, Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde's grandfather Oliverius Lombaerde, who married in 1747 in Figure 40.7, served as godfather in 1718 to a Spanish roots family in Figure 40.8. Likely, they were 'de Montoya,' a name which, along with this family, may have transformed into 'Du Mont.'

We have yet to do much research on the Lombaerde branch. Other genealogists, however, were stuck in the first half of the 17th century and did not encounter foreigners in their discoveries. Therefore, the Spanish families mentioned in the record below were probably friends of Lombaerde, not relatives.

The godmother was Joanna Maria de Santos.*

Oliverius Lombaerde was likely born at Harelbeke in 1659, on March 11, as the son of Bartholomeus Lombaerde and Maria Vanoutryve, with Oliverius Nolf as godfather and Joanna Vanoutryve as godmother.

Indeed, Oliverius Nolf was also godfather to Martina De Vos (Daughter of Carolus De Vos and Judoca De Meester) and probably formed a link with the De Vos (Vosa) family described in the maternal Desclergue branch in Part X.

At the same time, we also know that Maria Declercgz (DC08d) married Egidius Vandeputte (Du Puich), who had first been married to Magdalena Vanoutryve, again possibly a link, seen in Chapter 37.9.2. Maria Vanoutryve and Bartholomeus Lombaerde married at Harelbeke on July 8, 1656; one of their sons was Franciscus Lombaerde (1661).

40.4 Their Marriage

The wedding, shown in Figure 40.9, of Renier Declercq (DC10) and Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde occurred in 1770 at Kuurne, Belgium. The marriage witnesses were Pierre Lombaerde, father of the bride, and Marie Montaigne, mother of the groom. The couple would not reside in the same place but move several times, as attested by the certificates on which they appear as parents or godparents.

In the realm of the early family connections with the Bekaert family of Zwevegem, the reader can check Figure 40.13 showing the death of Isabelle Verhaeghe de Nayer, which we have in our archives without further knowledge.

VOLUME III

Part IX

The Desclergues in Modern Belgium

Chapter 41

Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11) & Barbara Thérèse d' Hont

41.1 Introduction

Pierre Joseph is a patrilineal ancestor. He was the son of Renier Declercq (DC10) and Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde and was born in Izegem in 1771.

His parents moved to Lendelede, probably in the 1790s. When he married Barbara Thérèse d'Hont in 1794, he lived in Lendelede but married in Izegem, where his bride lived.

The couple soon moved to Kuurne and would continue to reside there. Probably Marie Anne Thérèse d' Hont lived for a short while separated from her husband in Emelgem (next to Izegem) or had her official residence there in the period when the couple had their daughter Rosalie Declercq (DC12b) at Kuurne in 1800, as can be read in the concerned birth certificate shown in Figure 41.11. It's a mystery why this was so.

Future generations may search the archives to find the reason. For instance, just after WWI, this happened to couples, with one person rebuilding the home while the other resided in a haven where the children could go to school.

Contrary to earlier generations, we now have civil and church records to investigate the genealogy.

41.2 Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11)

He is a patrilineal forefather whose ancestors are shown in Figure 41.1. We can also observe in Figures 41.2 and 41.3 that Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11) wrote his family name consistent with our modern version.

We found him signing differently: Petrus Josephus Declercq, Pieter Declercq, Pieter Joseph Declercq. It is essential to observe that he wrote his family name 'Declercq' in one word and ending with '-cq,' irrespective of what the registrar did. This is the natural continuation of the old Spanish spelling 'Desclergue' from earlier chapters.

He was the son and only child to produce offspring of Renier Declercq (DC10) and Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde. He was born in 1771 at Izegem in Figure 41.4 and died in 1844, in Figure 41.5, at Kuurne in Belgium.

Like his descendants, he was a farmer and must have been involved in flax cultivation, as in Figure 41.6, and merchandising. On a map of 1842 by Philippe Christian Popp, several farms can be found belonging to the family of Declercq at Hulste and Kuurne.

41.3 Barbara Thérèse d' Hont

She was the wife of Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11) and was born in 1773 at Izegem. Her baptism is shown in Figure 41.7. She died in Kuurne in 1854, shown in Figure 41.8. She was the daughter of Pierre Joseph d' Hont, from Heule, and Marie Anne Thérèse Deryckere, from Heule. Her godfather was François Callens. Her godmother was Veronica Van Becelaere.

She was probably the sister of Anne Marie d' Hont, born around 1767, and wife of Pierre Joseph de Saintobin, born around 1765, who lived at Izegem between 1798 and 1811.

We found birth certificates of the following siblings of Barbara Thérèse d' Hont at Izegem: Petrus Joannes D' Hont (1771, the godfather was Joannes Baptiste Deryckere, godmother was Maria Francisca Deryckere), Anna Catharina (1778, the godfather was Josephus Delaere, godmother was Veronica Van Becelaere) and Petrus Joannes (1781, the godfather was Joannes Franciscus Van Haelewyn, godmother was Maria Anna Theresia D' Hont) Barbara Thérèse was a farmer at Kuurne, and she died in 1854 at Kuurne, Belgium.

Note that the family Deryckere were friends and later relatives of the family through the second marriage of Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde, as can be read in Chapter 40.3.

41.4 Their Marriage

Their wedding was in 1794, at Izegem, in Figure 41.9. The groom lived in Lendelede and was the son of Renier Declercq (DC10) ('Reginaldus : Renier') and Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde ('Delombaerde'). The bride was the daughter of Pierre Joseph d'Hont and Marie Anne Thérèse Deryckere. The bride's mother had been buried in Izegem in the same church by the same priest. Renier Declercq (DC10) and Pierre Joseph d'Hont were the wedding witnesses.

The couple had a daughter, Rosalie Declercq, born in 1800 at Kuurne, in Figure 41.11. Three years later, they had a son, Guillaume Declercq (DC12c), in Figure 41.12, who unfortunately died three days later. Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12), our ancestor, was born in 1808 at Kuurne and is described in the next chapter. In 1812, at Kuurne, their son Francois Eugene Declercq (DC12d) was born, in Figure 41.13. The latter would wait very long to marry and had no offspring. Some interesting information about him is found

His father, Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11), a farmer of 43 and living in Kuurne, signed exceptionally in two words because there was not enough space to spell his name in one word. Besides, the registrar chose to use '-ck' while Pierre Joseph insisted on '-cq' at the end of his name. The witnesses were Xavier Bossuyt, a farmer of 34 from Lendelede and Francois Wallaert from Kuurne. He remained childless; otherwise, his descendants would probably live on under the name 'Declerck' .*

Chapter 42

Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) & Thérèse Loncke

42.1 Introduction

Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) established 'Hof van Brussel,' is a patrilineal ancestor of the author, and is also described in Chapter 66.1 as the husband of Thérèse Loncke, the granddaughter of Barbara Benoit.

The memory of Spanish ancestry must have been an almost forgotten anecdote in the memory of the Desclergues in the life of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12), though only partially. Nevertheless, after his marriage to a bride from Wielsbeke, he established the farm 'Hof van Brussel' to commemorate the glory days of the family when the Spanish Monarchy governed the country through the center of power of the 'Hof van Brussel,' better known as the 'Palace of the Koudenberg' in Brussels.

Indeed, earlier chapters such as Chapter 8.7, Chapter 43, Chapter 29.5.25, Chapter 33.6, Chapter 38, and Chapter 39.6 show that the actual 'Hof van Brussel' at Brussels, also known as the 'Koudenberg Palace' or Palatium Bruxellense ducis Brabantiae, was the place from which the Spanish governed the Netherlands.

When the previous ancestors are considered, it is clear that the Declercqs could not find a place they called 'home.' Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) appears to be the first to settle and secure his position as a farmer and his children, which is vital to understand his sentiments.

Indeed, Pere Declercgz (II) (DC08), son of Antoni Declerque (III) (DC07) and Martina Ximenez de la Cruz, married Marie Prienne from Harelbeke and would decide, or be forced, to move away from Deerlijk. His son Joan Declercq (II) (DC09) married Marie Montaigne at Kuurne, and this family would remain at Kuurne. Their son Renier Declercq (II) (DC10) married Marie Anne Thérèse Lombaerde, and this couple was again forced to move on to Izegem and then to Lendelede. Their son Pierre Joseph Declercq (DC11), born at Izegem, married Barbara Thérèse d' Hont in 1794 and settled in Kuurne. The last couple had a son Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12), described in the current chapter, who could finally settle by marrying the eleven-year-older bride, Thérèse Loncke, from Wielsbeke in 1840.

The couple purchased or inherited a farm at Wielsbeke near Oostrozebekestraat, not far from the Leie River, shown in Figure 42.1. Leo Bernard Declercq gave the farm a name associated with his ancestors, Hof van Brussel.

Given their age, Leo Bernard (DC12) and his wife Thérèse Loncke miraculously still had a child, Ivo Declercq (DC13),[1] born in 1845, described in Chapter 43. This only child would be prosperous because of his family's small size, but he definitely must have missed siblings.

The Ferraris map of 1777 in Figure 42.2 shows the Declercq farm as land strip 36 at Wielsbeke. A map from 1841 shows it, in Figure 42.3 on the land strips 20-21.

The farm of Leo Bernard Declercq and Thérèse Loncke, with its land, was located East of the junction between 'Chemin nr 10' and 'Chemin nr 6' on the map in Figure 42.3. The latter street would later be named 'Oostrozebekestraat' and is nowadays 'Ridder de Ghellinckstraat.' 'Chemin nr 10' is the road along which the first encountered farm was 'Hof van Brussel.'

Therefore, the street received the name 'Hof van Brussel' and is nowadays 'Reynaertstraat.' When we compare the farm's shape in 1841 with the one found in pictures in subsequent generations, we must conclude that our family must have rebuilt it later, as seen in Figure 42.5. The street, ' Hof van Brussel,' already existed in 1858, shown in Figure 42.6.

42.2 Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12)

[1] Leo Bernard (DC12) likely did not randomly choose the name Ivo. It is the Spanish version of 'Yves,' after Yves de Bretagne (St Yves Tréguier), who had been declared holy by the pope during the lifetime of our ancestor Bertrand Du Guesclin (DG11). Given his contacts with the Verriest and the Renier families, described in this chapter, we consider it perfectly understandable that he decided to reaffirm his past and identity, which appears to be a family trait for short-named Desclergue descendants, whether Leo, Ivo. or Nico. His comfortable financial situation must have offered him more time to study and think about his ancestors than the previous generations, who probably struggled more to make a living.

The other certificates, including Leo Bernard's (DC12) wedding in 1840, offer sufficient redundancy to overrun this error. Indeed, the parents were 37, respectively 35 and not 45.*

42.2.1 His Birth, Military Service and Death

He was the only male descendant of the couple to have offspring and continue the Declercq bloodline, shown in Figure 42.9.

He waited long before getting married, and his bride was a decade older. As a result, only one child, Ivo (DC13), was born. Despite an unfortunate lack of siblings of these generations of the Desclergues, the family gained wealth and would, in Wielsbeke, have a good life for a couple of generations at the farm 'Hof van Brussel.'

Leo Bernard Declercq was a military shortly before the Belgian revolution of 1830 and was, therefore, in the Belgo-Dutch army under the King of the Netherlands. His military file is shown in Figure 42.10. Leo's signature is shown in Figures 42.11, 42.12 and 42.13.

Leo Bernard Declercq died on September 16, 1876, in Figure 42.14, and the notary opened his will on the same day at Meulebeke[2].

42.3 Flax and linen

Fence stones, or rootstenen, shown in Figure 42.15, played a crucial role during the retting season. The fences, retting cages, hekken, or rootbakken, filled with flax bundles, needed to be weighted down with these stones to ensure the flax and bins remained sufficiently submerged. After the retting season, the containers were dried in the Leie River meadows and repaired. Horses dragged the fences, placing them in long rows on fence stones within the Leiemeersen (Leie meadows) to protect them from rotting. Necessary repairs were conducted to prepare for the next retting season.

The fence stones were then piled in heaps along the meadow side of the hoist road to avoid obstructing the lines used by ship tractors. Lost or 'sunken' fence stones were retrieved from the mud using an iron claw or hook on a long heavy handle. The teeth of the claw were often cupped, sometimes with a wide iron ring, to facilitate scooping and holding the irregular stone.

The homes of flax merchants were easily recognized by the piles of fence stones in front, symbolizing their profession and status. For instance, Figure 42.16 shows that in the 1950s, Michel Declercq (DC15) visibly stacked such stones against his house, signifying his birthright as a flax merchant. Flax merchants highly valued their status, a tradition continued by the author for sentimental reasons, as seen in Figure 42.16.

The production of flax and flax linen dates back to ancient Egypt, where mummies were wrapped in linen. When the Romans entered Gaul in 57 BC, they were impressed by the numerous beautiful flax fields. Before this, the Romans already recognized the region as a flax-producing area. Around 200 BC, Plautus wrote, Lineae Cooper est Gallia (Gaul is covered with linen workhouses). Virgil noted that the Gallic people made linen cloth for their sails. Pliny praised the high-quality flax linen produced along the coastal region between Boulogne and Ypres in his Historia Naturalis. He described the women's linen clothes as the finest he had ever seen. Julius Caesar was similarly impressed by the flax linen smocks worn by northern Gaul men. Druids also wore linen robes, likely introduced by the Celts. Consequently, the region was called Belgica by the Romans and later internationally recognized as Belgium, deriving from the Celtic word for flax, Belc' h. Thus, the etymological origin of Belgium likely predates that of Flanders.

The flax and linen industry experienced several fluctuations, often influenced by its relationship with the wool industry. In the 16th century, the flax industry struggled, with flax from the Kortrijk and Roeselare regions primarily sold to Ghent and traded with Spain. During the latter half of the sixteenth century, with the arrival of the Desclergues, nearly everyone in the region was involved in flax and linen production. Almost every cottage or farm grew flax and wove it into linen. Emperor Charles V once remarked, there will always be prosperity as long as the population can process flax (Figure 42.22). Following the wars of religion in the Netherlands, many flax experts emigrated to France and Holland, creating fierce competition for Flanders. During Napoleon's time, the Flemish flax industry thrived, especially as his regime banned English wool. Flax retted in the Leie was particularly popular despite previous prohibitions.

The image also appears on postcards that are more than a century old. It shows fence stones used to submerge flax in the water to establish a fair retting process. In the back, there are also stacks of retting rocks visible.*

Figure 42.16: Massive and smaller retting stones were placed in front of Michel Declercq's house in the 1950s, which were prestigious symbols to show that he stemmed from a family of flax merchants. We still use small retting stones as ornaments in our garden (2020), not for prestige but as souvenirs, and they are covered by Sedum Spurium, which descend from cuttings taken from the farm 'Hof van Brussel' of the Declercqs in Wielsbeke. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Flax production has always been sensitive to international influences such as wars and competition. In the 20th century, communist Russia emerged as a significant competitor for Flemish flax. Hence, Michel Declercq (DC15) was a staunch opponent of communism for economic and religious reasons, deeming it a devil's system.

42.4 Thérèse Loncke

She was a farmer who was a descendant of the Benoit family. In Figure 42.17, her ancestors were dairy farmers. She was married to Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) and was born at her parents' home in 1797 in Wielsbeke, where she was a farmer, and baptized in the Saint Laurentius church in Figure 42.18. Her birth is shown in Figures 42.19 and 42.20. She is referred to in the Chapter 66.1 as the daughter of Marie Magdalena Desplenter and Jean François Loncke.

Thérèse Loncke's brother Jean Loncke, born at Wielsbeke in 1785, had Jeanne Benoit from Waregem as Godmother. Jeanne Benoit (Wielsbeke 1716 - Waregem 1799) was Barbara Benoit's sister. Joseph Benoit (Wielsbeke 1726-Wielsbeke 1783) was a brother of Barbara and Jeanne Benoit, and he was married to Jeanne Marie Thérèse Baert at Wielsbeke in 1755; she died at Wielsbeke in 1804 and given her name, may have been the Godmother of Thérèse Loncke, although the baptism has not been retrieved for investigation.

The Loncke family was farmers in the area around Hulste. A 1794 cattle census, for instance, indicates that the Loncke family was the leading dairy farmers clan of Hulste at a farm near the Potterijstraat.

42.5 Their Marriage and Child

The wedding of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) and Thérèse Loncke took place in 1840 at Wielsbeke, Belgium, in the church shown in Figure 42.18.

From the marriage, shown in Figures 42.23 and 42.24.

Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) was an unmarried farmer, resident of Kuurne, and born there on February 28, 1808. He was the son of 69-year-old Pierre Joseph Declercq and 67-year-old Barbara Thérèse d'Hont, farmers at Kuurne. Thérèse Loncke was equally a farmer, residing in Wielsbeke and born there on December 1, 1797 ('11 frimaire an 6'). She was an unmarried daughter of Jean François ('Joannes') Loncke, who died in Wielsbeke on May 26, 1832, and of Marie Magdalena Desplenter, who died in Wielsbeke on May 15, 1812. Thérèse Loncke was a granddaughter of Jacques Loncke, who died in Wielsbeke on April 25, 1774, and of Anna Maria Lecluyse, who died in Wielsbeke on January 8, 1799 ('19 nivose an 7'). She was also a granddaughter of Livinus Desplenter, who died in Wielsbeke on July 27, 1774, and of Barbara Benoit ('Barbara Benoot'), who died in Wielsbeke on November 24, 1774. The latter is also confirmed in Chapter 66.1.14.

As mentioned earlier, the couple had only one son to continue the Declercq bloodline, namely Ivo (DC13), described in Chapter 43. The descending generations are shown in Figure 42.25.

42.6 Thérèse's Grandfather 'Dominus' Jacobus Loncke

Jacobus Loncke married Anna Maria Lecluyse in Ingelmunser in 1748. Their son, born in Wielsbeke in 1752, was Jean François Loncke, who married Marie Magdalena Desplenter in 1778. Jean François Loncke and Marie Magdalena Desplenter were the parents of Thérèse Loncke. Jacobus Loncke has been a student at the Catholic University of Leuven. His inscription can be found on January

42.7 Their Link with the Renier Family and an Exciting Example of Name Evolution

Thérèse Loncke, born in Wielsbeke, married Leo Bernard Declercq in 1840. They were grandparents of Ernest Constant Declercq, father of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq.

The Renier family, shown in Figures 42.27 and 42.28, has particularly become famous at Deerlijk, where the early Desclergues lived and would form bonds again in the next generations. The Declercq family and the Renier family knew one another much earlier, we may presume, because, during the decades before, they also lived in the same area (Heule-Hulste-Kuurne). The families 'Renier' and 'Deconinck' are well-known for their literature, poetry, and education (primarily at Deerlijk).

Pieter Jan Renier wrote a poem about flax, which most likely revered the Declercqs, given their involvement in his industry:

' In België wordt het land bereid
voor 't Vlas !
Men ploegt met zorg en wijs beleid
voor 't Vlas !
Men mest, men egt, men zaait, men wiedt
voor 't Vlas !'

Thérèse Loncke, descending from cattle farmers, had known Pierre Jean Renier (Pieter Jan Renier, Deerlijk 1795 – Deerlijk 1859) while the Renier family lived in Wielsbeke (Sint-Baafs-Vijve). Pierre Jean Renier's parents were Jean Joseph Renier (Heule

de Mademoiselle Adelaïde
RENIER,
Née à DEERLYK le 12 Janvier 1824;
y décédée le 8 Mars 1852.

Depuis longtemps toutes ses pensées étaient pour le ciel, et sur la fin de sa vie, ses plus fréquentes aspirations étaient en termes équivalents celles de l'Apôtre: Je désire d'être dégagé de tous les liens du corps et d'être avec Jésus-Christ. PHIL., I, 23.

Et ses dernières paroles étaient celles du roi-prophète: Je me suis réjoui à cause de ce qui m'a été dit, que nous irons dans la maison du Seigneur. PS. CXXI, 1.

Elle est maintenant dans le ciel; là, sans doute, elle prie pour nous, car, en s'éloignant de nous, elle ne nous a pas abandonnés.

1773 – Deerlijk 1811) and Marie Josephe Deconinck, as shown in Figure 42.29. Jean Joseph was the son of Jean François Xavier Renier and Marie Françoise Glorieux. The Renier family lived in Wielsbeke from 1798 until 1808, where younger siblings of Pieter Jan Renier were born, e.g., Amelie Rosalie Renier and Eugeen Joseph Renier.

Like the Desclergue family, the Renier family has been mobile. The reason is that they married exotic partners from different regions of the country.

It is certain that Pieter Jan Renier's wife, Scholastique Delehuvenne, was bilingual, which can be seen upon investigating her ancestry in Figure 42.29. Indeed, she has a French family name, and her father was born in Escanaffles, where one spoke French. Interestingly she also has foreign ancestors called 'Peis' or 'Pes,' which probably originate either from an Italian family, 'Pesce,' from a Spanish family, 'Peset,' or from a German family, 'Peiss.'

In fact, in this book's context, the 'Peis ancestors' of Scholastique Delehuvenne form an excellent example of how names evolve not because of time but because of integration issues. We can see that the family insisted on the correct pronunciation of their name for a long time, which was either of the three possibilities above, but sounded like 'Peis' or 'Pes.' Since there was a similar name in Flanders, i.e., 'Peers' or 'Peirs,' the local authorities (the priest, in our study) always attempted to interpret the word as such and insisted on an immediate integration. So, although the family commanded several decades, ultimately, society won, and the name became 'Peers,' just like the local name. The evolution is not linear in time because it depends on where a registration occurred. Before showing the records, we can make the following summary: Peesz (1730 Oeselgem), Pees (1730 Oeselgem), Pees 1730 Oeselgem), Peess (1731 Oeselgem), Peess (1733 Oeselgem), Peers (1760 Zulte), Peys (1761 Waregem), Pes (1764 Desselgem), Peis (1766 Desselgem), Peis (1769 Desselgem), Peis (1771 Desselgem), Peis (1774 Desselgem), Pes (1785 Desselgem), Peis (1787 Desselgem), Peers (1846 Deerlijk). In Figures 42.30, 42.31, 42.32, 42.33, 42.34, 42.35, 42.36, 42.37, 42.38, 42.39, 42.40, 42.41, 42.42, 42.43 and 42.44, every certificate is shown to help the reader interested in such a name evolution.

As mentioned above, the Declercq family and the Renier family knew one another much earlier, presumably because they lived in the same area (Heule-Hulste-Kuurne) during the decades before.

The Renier family is so famous that numerous works exist about them. The description we offer here is primarily based on an extensive article by Dominique Velghe[4].

Pieter Jan Renier (1795-1859) was friends with Hendrik Conscience (1812-1833), like Charles Lammens (1814 - 1881) described in Chapter 71.6.5, who had been a soldier with Conscience. Pieter Jan Renier was born in Deerlijk on September 21, 1795. He was the eldest son of Maria Josepha Columba de Coninck (born in Harelbeke in 1769) and Jan Jozef Renier (born in Heule in 1773). Maria de Coninck's grandfather was Pieter de Coninck, an author of a play about the Battle of the Golden Spurs in Kortrijk in 1302.

Jan Jozef Renier was a teacher, first in Tielt and then in Deerlijk, where he founded a French school in 1792 in the infrastructure of his uncle Pierre Glorieux. The school immediately went well, but Renier moved to Wakken with his family. A few years later, however, he returned to become a village teacher again. He soon received assistance from his son Pieter Jan Renier, who would later succeed him.

Jean-Joseph Renier died in 1811 at the age of 38. Pieter Jan Renier was only 16 then and continued school. He was also admitted by the Académie de Bruxelles, an institution within the Imperial University of the French who then, under Napoleon Bonaparte, ruled the Low Countries, including Deerlijk.

On March 27, 1816, Pieter Jan Renier married Scholastica Delehuvenne, four years older. Given his interest in education, her beautiful name will undoubtedly have influenced his choice. The couple had 11 children.

Although the Flanders' government became Dutch in 1815, we can nevertheless assume that his wife's bilingualism must have been an advantage if only to attract foreign-language students. The administration was perhaps partially Dutch, but French was still essential in teaching, and the certificates and diplomas were used in education. Several other schools in Deerlijk arrived partly due to Pieter Jan Renier's example.

From 1817, there was also a boarding school in Deerlijk founded by Renier.

Due to Renier's tremendous success and good connections, children from far away came to boarding school, and tuition fees were increased on a competitive basis to the extent that children from Deerlijk hardly had a chance to study with Renier. In that context, others also established schools, creating a cascade system. Out of frustration, the city council even lowered the subsidies for Renier's school. The colloquial language in Renier's school was always French, but there were also Dutch lessons.

Besides, Renier was also the author of 'Beginselen der Vlaemsche Spraekkunst.' For example, the children also learned to translate the fables of De La Fontaine. Other teachers also assisted Renier. Some were related to him, including Aloisius Renier, his son, who would succeed him as director.

Renier's school was initially a blended institute, but in 1826, a girls' school was split off.

Pieter Jan Renier was a pioneer in education in Flanders and is known for his works, such as De slag der Gulden Sporen (The Battle of the Golden Spurs), a play he wrote.

He also took part in several linguistic competitions where he scored very high.

The Dutch regime did not appreciate Renier. His real breakthrough as a writer came after the foundation of the modern Belgian state in 1830. Unsurprisingly, he is remembered very well at Deerlijk, in Figure 42.45.

42.8 Their Link with the Verriest Family

Thérèse Loncke, born in 1797, was of the same age as Pierre Jean Verriest, born in 1796, father of the well-known Verriest family in Deerlijk.

Pierre Jean Verriest was a son of Pierre Jean Verriest (1763-1832) and Marie Françoise Veys (1762-1836). He had the following siblings: Isabelle Rose Verriest (1785-1833), Pierre Joseph Verriest (1787-1840), Maria Angela Verriest (1790-1792), and Louis Verriest (1793-1864). Pierre Jean Verriest (1796-1871) was born in Deerlijk and was a merchant, sexton, and armenmeester (responsible for supporting people experiencing poverty). In the context of our genealogy, it is interesting to note that Pierre Jean Verriest (1763-1832) was a son of Pierre Joseph Verriest (1738-1782) and Marie-Jeanne Debels (1731-1813) and that Pierre Joseph Verriest was a son of Roger Verriest (1692-1761) and Joanna Pauwels (1684-1764).

Oda Verriest (1832-1891) was a nun ('Agnes') with the Sisters Sint Vincentius 'a Paulo, just like Ernestine Declercq, granddaughter of Ivo Declercq (DC13). Hugo Verriest (1840-1922) was the pastor and apprentice of Guido Gezelle. He was five years older than Ivo Declercq (DC05).

Julie Tharsile Verriest (1838-1908) married Emile Henry Sobry from Zwevegem. Adolphe Prosper Verriest (1830-1891) was a school friend of Guido Gezelle in Roeselare. He became a lawyer and alderman and was director of the music school of Kortrijk.

Charles Louis Verriest (1828-1894) was a notary and mayor of Deerlijk from 1872 to 1885, and Theophile Renier succeeded him.

In Chapter 43.7 and Chapter 44.11, we also refer to the Verriest family.

Zij was de Vrouw en Moeder, vol liefde en zorg, houdend haar huis onder den zegen Gods, in eere en plicht, in licht en schoonheid, vol deugd en vreugd, en wijzend den weg naar geluk door stil woord en stil voorbeeld.

Hare geheugenis gaat mede door het leven, en haar naam blijft eeuwig welkom onder ons, omdat hij een erf van eere is van goedheid en troost.

In haar ouderlijk huis en bij O.L.V. ter ruste, verwachtte zij nog eenige jaren tevredenheid ; zij vond er in heilige dood de rust der eeuwigheid.

Mijn eenige Zoon, mijn Broeder, mijne Neven, die priester zijt, bidt voor mij aan het autaar des Heeren.

Gij weet hoe ik u allen beminde. Ik weet hoe gij mij allen bemindet. In trouw hebben wij, Ouders en Kinders, het leven gedeeld. Ik ga vooren weg, maar de liefde breekt niet, en in troostend betrouwen zeg ik u: tot wederziens.

Zoet Hert van Maria, wees mijne zaligheid. (300 d.a.)

Hij was een eerlijk man, eenvoudig, oprecht en voorzichtig, vreedzaam en goed van herten, lief in zijnen handel en recht in woord en werken. Chapter 43

Ivo Declercq (DC13) & Mathilde Van den Broucke

43.1 Introduction

Ivo Declercq (DC13) represents a pivotal figure in our patrilineal heritage. Alongside his wife, Mathilde Van den Broucke, he heralded the family's transition into the modern farming era, marked by significant advancements in trade and education.

A crucial advantage facilitated this era of progress: Ivo Declercq, as an only child, inherited substantial resources that enabled the family's upward trajectory. Mathilde Van den Broucke, hailing from a lineage of farmers and entrepreneurs, complemented Ivo's assets with her familial legacy. Their union solidified a foundation of agricultural and commercial prowess.

The couple's legacy was furthered by their son, Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14), and subsequently by his son, Michel Declercq (DC15), from whom we directly descend. The Van den Broucke name remains esteemed in Wielsbeke, recognized for its contributions to farming, the flax trade, and industry during the latter half of the 20th century.

Ivo and Mathilde were not only progressive farmers but also cultivated a sense of nobility and erudition within their household. This is evident in the distinguished names they bestowed upon their children, honoring Roman emperors and reflecting their vision and aspirations for future generations.

43.2 Ivo Declercq (DC13)

Ivo (DC13) is the author's great-great-grandfather and is described in Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit. His ancestors are shown in Figure 43.1, and his signature in Figures 43.2, 43.3 and 43.4.

Ivo, born in 1845 in Wielsbeke, was the husband of Mathilde Van den Broucke. His birth certificate in Figure 43.5 shows us that his father, Leo Bernard Declercq, was 37 years old and born in Kuurne. The document tells that he was a textile manufacturer, although he was a farmer. This indicates that he combined farming with the more lucrative textile fabrication and flax trading. Figure 43.6 shows a family souvenir of a person sowing linseed for flax cultivation.

Ivo's mother, Thérèse Loncke, was 48 years old and was born in Wielsbeke.

Ivo (DC13) was a Farmer, like his parents and in-laws.

He lived in Wielsbeke and died in Kuurne in 1909.

The registrar of Wielsbeke copied his death certificate on his records. They are both given in Figures 43.8 and 43.9. Ivo has fulfilled his military service during his life, shown in Figure 43.7.

43.3 Mathilde Van den Broucke

43.3.1 Her Life

Mathilde Van den Broucke, a farmer, is equally referred to in the Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit.

She comes from a family of farmers. She was the daughter of Jean-Baptiste Van den Broucke and Victoria Verlinde. Her distant relatives would become renowned linen manufacturers in the area of Wielsbeke in a joint venture with the Lambrecht family.

She was born in 1848, in Figure 43.11 early in the morning at Molsten in Wielsbeke on July 31, and was the wife of Ivo Declercq (DC13).

Her father, Jean-Baptiste Van den Broucke, was a son of Amand François Van Den Broucke and Barbara Debouvere and was born in Ingelmunster in 1813. Her mother was Victoria Verlinde, daughter of Ignace Verlinde and Barbara Thérèse du Bois. Jean Baptiste Van den Broucke and Victoria Verlinde married in 1847 at Wielsbeke. Victoria Verlinde passed away in 1851; Jean Baptiste re-married Sophia Francisca Vervaeke from Lendelede in 1852.

Mathilde had one brother, Constant Ignace, who lived in Ooigem.

She equally had a half-brother, Jules Van den Broucke, born in 1855; a half-sister, Marie-Flavie, born in Wielsbeke in 1860; a brother, Petrus Adolf, born in 1857; and a brother, Ivo Charles Louis, born in 1853. The latter would later serve as a witness on the birth certificate of Judith Declercq, in Chapter 44.5.8, daughter of Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14).

Jean Baptiste Van den Broucke was born in 1814 in Ingelmunster and died in Wielsbeke in 1890. The Van den Broucke family originates from Hulste, where they owned a considerable farm in Oostrozebekestraat.

Amand François van den Broucke was the son of Amand François van den Broucke (senior) and of Marie Jeanne Ramon (1753-1794) from Ingelmunster, who was the daughter of Jean Ramon and Marie Jeanne du Bois, both farmers. The family of du Bois originates from Rollegem along the Lys River (Leie) near Kortrijk. It is possible, though not sure, that Jozef Van den Broucke, son of Van den Broucke-Glorieux and married to Claire Lambrecht, is a grandson of one of the (half) brothers of Mathilde Van den Broucke (the aforementioned Constant Ignace, Jules, Petrus Adolf or Ivo Charles Louis), for instance through Medard Jozef Van den Broucke, born in Wielsbeke in 1892 or Maurice Alois Edgard Van den Broucke, born in Wielsbeke in 1893.

The documents could not yet be found to investigate further the link between the family Van den Broucke-Lambrecht and Declercq-Devenyn. It is known that the Lambrecht family was linked to Declercq through friendship, but it is not known if there was also a blood-relationship, the same as with the family Van den Broucke.

Mathilde Van den Broucke had an auntie, Barbara Theresia Van den Broucke, in Figure 43.10, born in Hulste on June 12, 1815, and daughter of Amandys Van den Broucke and Barbara Debouvere. She would become more than 100 years old and married Frederic Verbeke from Waregem. The couple lived at 'Gaverken,' where, later, Judith Declercq would live.

We have not retrieved any details of Mathilde Van den Broucke's death. Perhaps she died in Wielsbeke, or Kuurne, Ghent or Lauwe. Only if we had access to all the registers, we would find her. Privacy clauses make genealogy of the 20th century difficult, but the data should become available in the following decades.

43.3.2 Her Relatives

Figures 43.13 and 43.14 show the wedding of Jean Baptiste Van den Broucke and Francisca Sophia Vervaeke. Jean Baptiste was Mathilde's father, who remarried after Mathilde's mother, Victoria Verlinde, had died. Figure 43.15 shows the obituary card of Mathilde's half-brother Adolf.

Her half-brother's wedding is shown in Figures 43.18 and 43.19.

The parents of Mathilde Van den Broucke were Jean Baptiste Van den Broucke and Victoria Verlinde. Their marriage is shown in Figures 43.21 and 43.22. Victoria was the daughter of Ignace Verlinde, who died in Oostrozebeke on March 21, 1824. He also had a son with Barbe Thérèse Van den Bussche, Ignace Verlinde, born at Ooigem on September 2, 1808, who married Sophie Verbeke (born in Wielsbeke on June 6, 1815) in Wielsbeke on April 1, 1842. Barbe Thérèse Van den Bussche was born around 1770 and lived at Meulebeke in 1842. Victoria Verlinde died in 1851 at age 34, shown in Figure 43.24.

Ivo Declercq (DC13) and Mathilde Van den Broucke married in 1869 in Wielsbeke, Belgium, in Figures 43.25 and 43.26.

The groom was a farmer, born in Wielsbeke on September 25, 1845, and residing in Wielsbeke, unmarried son of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12), a 61 years old farmer, living in Wielsbeke and present on the wedding; and of Thérèse Loncke, death at Wielsbeke on December 2, 1868. The groom had fulfilled his military duties.

The bride was a farmer, born in Wielsbeke on July 31, 1848, and residing in Wielsbeke, underaged and unmarried daughter of 55 years old farmer Jean Baptiste Van den Broucke, who lived in Wielsbeke and was present at the wedding, and of Victoria Verlinde, death in Wielsbeke on August 9, 1851.

The couple had a marriage contract with Leo Henri Vermeulen, notary at Wielsbeke. None of the witnesses was a blood relative.

43.5 Their Offspring

As mentioned early on in this chapter, Ivo Declercq (DC13) and Mathilde Van den Broucke were likely aware of the Spanish origins of the family. Apart from naming their farm after the Spanish government center Hof van Brussel and apart from the specificity of Ivo's first name, they also ensured, by coincidence or not, that all the children had names containing such indications. Indeed, each child had a series of names, of which at least one started with M (Montblanc) or E (España). When we only consider the first two sons, we find M(ontblanc) E(spaña) and E(spaña) C(atalonia). It's an observation, but we cannot know if it was also the parents' intention. Nevertheless, it's an exciting fact, and it is clear that names were repeated, which was intentional. The children were:

The persons who reported the death were Modest Declercq, 39-year-old farmer and son of Ivo, and Emile Deman, a 42-year-old flax merchant. Ivo died on October 12 at the house of Modest in Section B of Kuurne. He was a 64-year-old farmer, born in and resident of Wielsbeke, son of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) and Thérèse Loncke, husband of 60-year-old farmer Mathilde Van den Broucke residing at Wielsbeke. Note that no records have been found of any children of Modest, neither at Wielsbeke nor at Kuurne, whence we assume that he remained childless and perhaps even never married.*

The child was born early morning at Molsten in Wielsbeke.*

Modest Ernest Declercq (DC13c) was born in 1870 and shown in Figures 43.28 and 43.29. He became a farmer at Kuurne, but we found no indications that he ever married.

Marie Louise Declercq (DC13d) was born in 1871 in Figure 43.30. We have found no further trace of her and assume she became a religious sister.

Ernest Constant Declercq (DC13), born in 1872. He is our ancestor and married Marie Elodie Devenyn. We describe him in Chapter 44.2.

Aimé Emile Leopold Declercq (DC13e), born in 1875 in Figures 43.31 and 43.32. We have found no further trace and assume he may have become a priest. Furthermore, we have not found any military record of him, so perhaps he died at a young age.

Emile Alphons Declercq (DC13f), born in 1881. He died after ten months.

Elie Marie Mathilde Declercq (DC13g), born in 1883. She died after 11 months.

Flavie Marie Louise Declercq (DC13b) was born in 1886 and described in Chapter 44. She married, in 1912, Georges Van Haverbeke from Lauwe, and died in Ghent in 1926. George Louis Joseph Constant Van Haverbeke was a merchant born in Lauwe in 1880 and the son of Louis Joseph Van Haverbeke and Romanie De Brabandere. Her birth is shown in Figures 43.33 and 43.34.

Another observation is that Ivo and Mathilde frequently chose the names of Roman Emperors. In particular, the following emperors had exciting names in the context of their choices: Gaius Flavius Valerius Constantius (Emperor 305-306), Flavius Iulius Constantius, Flavius Iulius Constantius (Emperor 337-361), Flavius Claudius Constantius Gallus (Emperor 351-354), Flavius Constantius (Emperor 421). We should also remember father and son Ernesto Mansfeld (Peter Ernst I von Mansfeld and Peter Ernest II von Mansfeld), commanders of the Spanish armed forces in the 16th century. It required merely some interest in the topics and access to books to develop these names. Unfortunately, we cannot make time travel and ask.

43.6 The Mansion Ten Broucke in Wielsbeke

Ivo Declercq (DC13) and Mathilde Van den Broucke were well-acquainted with the Van der Bruggen family. Although the exact nature of their relationship remains unverified, extant documents confirm their acquaintance. There is also evidence of an association with Ghent, suggesting that the family occasionally engaged the services of a notary from Ghent or chose to reside or study there in subsequent generations. Consequently, it is reasonable to infer that the family visited the castle 'Ten Broucke' in Wielsbeke occasionally.

Mathilde Van den Broucke likely descended from a family from the 'Ten Broucke' estate. This manor held low jurisdiction and was feudally subordinate to the castle of Kortrijk and the Leenhof of Tielt. The 'Ten Broucke' administration included a bailiff, an under-bailiff, a sergeant, and seven aldermen. Historical records indicate that Wouter van Harelbeke was the castle's lord in 1359. It later passed to the Uuten Zwane family, the lords of Wakken. In 1485, Joris van Crombrugghe acquired the manor. Sanderus' Flandria Illustrata (1641-1644) references the estate as*Curia Ten Broucken*, owned by Mr. Ghiselbert Franciscus van Crombruggh. Upon Frans de Crombrugghe's death, his daughter married the knight Ildefons Van der Bruges in 1719, transferring the castle to the Van der Bruggen family. After a devastating fire destroyed the original castle, the family constructed a new one around 1780.

In the 1860s, Lord Frederic-Charles van der Bruggen renovated the castle's southwestern extension and renewed the roof around 1870. In 1880, Maurice van der Bruggen further enlarged the castle. From 1895, the estate became the permanent residence of Baron Maurice van der Bruggen, who had previously been mayor of Wingene. From 1888, Baron van der Bruggen also served as a representative of the Catholic Party and, from 1899 to 1907, as Minister of Agriculture, National Health, and Fine Arts. The Van der Bruggen couple had no children. Subsequently, the heirs leased the castle to Catholic organizations, who renamed it 'Hernieuwenburg.' Today, the castle serves as the town hall, and its grounds have been transformed into a recreational area.

Following World War II, Wielsbeke saw an influx of immigrants drawn by the village's burgeoning textile and clay plate industries. These newcomers, lacking familial ties to the village, exhibited little interest in preserving its history. As a result, much of the local historical knowledge has faded. Regrettably, many residents today are unaware of their village's rich heritage. The Declercq family maintained a connection with the Van der Bruggen family, as evidenced by memorabilia shown in Figures 43.36, 43.37, and 43.38.

43.7 The Verriest Family

The family Verriest is primarily described in Chapter 42.8. Interested in culture and education, Ivo Declercq (DC13) must have visited Deerlijk, shown in Figure 43.39, and knew the Verriest family well. We show some memorabilia in Figures 43.40 and 43.41.

43.8 Other Acquaintances

43.9 Ivo Declercq (DC13) was Well Established

We have described above that Ivo (DC13) had no siblings and was relatively wealthy. He invested money, was a farmer, was involved in textile fabrication and flax trade, and was well-connected. Indeed, the family of Van der Bruggen was not the only family he had relations with; Verriest and others were friends, too, even in Ghent. His investments must have reflected his vision of the modern economy. Two representative memorabilia are shown in Figure 43.43.

43.10 Were there Spanish Descendants Already in Wielsbeke?

We have not found conclusive evidence that Wielsbeke had Spanish persons among its inhabitants before the arrival of the Declercq family.

However, there is one interesting case that several genealogists have no clue about and may be of Spanish descent. It concerns Maria Hermenez. Her family name is unusual and may come from Ximenez. The traces we have found are shown in Figures 43.44, 43.45, and 43.46.

On January 10, 1682, Adrianus de Corte was baptized, son of Ludovicus de Corte and Maria Hermine, with godparents Joannes Van Hoff and Anna Boesserie.

On November 29, 1715, Maria Magdalena was baptized, daughter of Ludovicus de Corte and Maria Anna Tack, with godparents Joannes Tack and Magdalena Tack, indicating that Ludovicus likely had no close relatives in Wielsbeke.

On April 21, 1756, Ludovicus de Corte was buried, son of Ludovicus de Corte and Maria Herminez and widower of Maria Anna Tack.

Although not proven, perhaps Herminez came from Ximenes and de Corte from Cortes. The families Van der Bruggen and Van Crombrugge, who resided in Wielsbeke and were acquainted with the Declercqs, often have foreign names in their godparents or other witnesses.

DE
Mademoiselle Octavie-Joséphine
VAN DER BRUGGEN,
née à Gand, le 8 juillet 1810, décédée au Château de Wielsbeke, le 27 août 1863.

Bienheureux celui qui étend ses soins intelligents sur le pauvre et l'indigent, le Seigneur le délivrera au jour mauvais. Ps. XL, 2.

Elle pouvait dire avec le saint homme Job : Que Dieu pèse mes œuvres, et qu'il juge : si j'ai refusé aux pauvres ce qu'ils voulaient, et si j'ai fait attendre les yeux de la veuve; si j'ai mangé seul mon pain sans le partager avec l'orphelin, si j'ai négligé celui qui, n'ayant point d'habit, mourait de froid et le pauvre qui était sans vêtements. JOB XXXI.

Seigneur, vous nous l'aviez donnée pour notre bonheur; vous nous la réclamez, nous vous la rendons sans murmurer, mais le cœur navré de douleur. ST-EPHREM.

Mon Jésus, miséricorde! — PIE IX. 100 jours d'indulg.

Chapter 44

Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) & Marie Elodie Devenyn

44.1 Introduction

From this chapter onward, we enter the era of photography. To compare the faces of four generations of Desclerqs, we present Figure 44.1.

Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) is a patrilineal ancestor who, with his wife, Marie Elodie Devenyn, was the kind of farmer who dwelled prosperously but was not opulent. The couple spent much of their resources and energy on their children's education, reading books, and other cultural activities.

To a large extent, we can compare them to the Verriest family from Deerlijk.

Most of their children were daughters, but they received equal opportunities as the boys, which was quite extraordinary then.

44.2 Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14)

Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) also appears in Chapter 66.1 as the great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit.

44.2.1 His Birth, Military Service and Death

He was born on July 28, 1872, at 3 am, in Figure 44.2, in Wielsbeke, Belgium, at Hof van Brussel, as the son of Ivo Declercq (DC13) and Mathilde Van den Broucke. Ivo Declercq was a son of Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12) and Thérèse Loncke.

As a young man, Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) has been a Belgian military, as seen in Figure 44.3.

He died in Olsene in 1947, shown in Figures 44.4 and 44.5.

He married Marie Elodie Devenyn in 1901 at Wielsbeke.

He was a farmer. His farm was called Hof van Brussel and was located in nowadays 'Reynaertstraat' in Wielsbeke. The name of his farm referred to the Palace in Brussels located at Coudenberg and is, therefore, a reference to the early history of the Desclergues in Belgium, as described earlier.

Before the industrialization after WWII, Wielsbeke was a small cosy village with several peculiar landmarks as shown in Figure 44.6.

44.2.2 The Ancestry of Ernest Constant Declercq

His ancestry is provided in Figure 44.7.

44.2.3 Blood-Relatives of Ernest Constant Declercq

We refer to Chapter 43.5 for detailed information about Ernest Constant Declercq's (DC14) siblings.

Of his siblings who have survived childhood, we can mention two with whom there existed contact and two of which we have not retrieved a single document.

The former are Modest Ernest Declercq (DC13c), born in 1870, and Flavie Marie Louise Declercq (DC13b), born in 1886.

The latter two are Marie Louise Declercq (DC13d), born in 1871, and Aimé Emile Leopold Declercq (DC13e), born in 1875.

The two missing persons have either died and were not correctly registered or have become religious clergy. Otherwise, they never married and were never involved in the family's official administrative events, or perhaps they migrated to another country. We don't know. Future research may shine a light on their destiny.

Excellente compagne, elle faisait la joie de son époux ; son amabilité lui était un délice ; elle excellait en sagesse et en douceur ; la maison resplendissait de sa grâce comme le firmament au lever du soleil ; tous célébraient à l'envi sa générosité. Eccl. 26, 31, 36.

Figure 44.11: The obituary card of Flavie Declercq. She died childless in Ghent on November 5, 1926, at the age of 40. The given information suggests that her sister Marie Louise Declercq may still have been alive, although we can' t distinguish whether the text refers to her siblings or those of her husband. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

We know that Modest Ernest Declercq (DC13c) was a farmer at Kuurne, but no documents reveal any marriage. Likely, he never married.

Flavie Marie Louise Declercq (DC13b) married Georges Van Haverbeke from Lauwe, and she died in Ghent in 1926. We do not have much information about her either, but we assume that it was thanks to her that Michel Declercq (DC15) resided in Ghent during his education, as seen in Chapter 45.1.3. Figures 44.8 and 44.9 show the birth certificate of Flavie Declercq (DC13b).

Flavie Marie Louise Declercq married Georges Louis Joseph Constant Van Haverbeke in 1912. Her husband was a 32-year-old merchant, born and residing at Lauwe. His birthday was on July 9, 1880. His parents were Louis Joseph, who died at Lauwe on July 16, 1895, and 63-year-old Romanie de Brabandere, who witnessed the wedding. The groom's notary was Arthur Guillemyn in Lauwe. The bride's notary was Edmond Van Severen in Wakken.

Privacy concerns make it challenging to research relatives in the 20th century when an obituary card is sometimes the only information on which to count. Anyone continuing this research half a century from now should have full access to all the documents and fill the gaps in our current knowledge and understanding.

44.3 Marie Elodie Devenyn

44.3.1 Introduction

For all we know, Marie Elodie is remembered by her grandchildren as a strong grandmother who firmly held the families strings. She can be seen in Figure 44.12.

44.3.2 Her Birth and Death

She was born in 1876 in Wielsbeke and was a farmer, in Figures 44.13 and 44.14, as the daughter of Leopold Devenyn and Ursula Vereecke. She was an only child. Marie Elodie Devenyn is equally referred to in the Chapter 66.1 because her husband was a great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit. Marie Elodie Devenyn was Ernest Constant Declercq's wife and the author's great-grandmother. She married in 1901 and died in 1965 in Waregem. She was very emancipated, and she ensured, with her husband, that all her children, including her daughters, would have a good education. She died in 1965 in Waregem, in Figures 44.15 and 44.16. The death was declared to the registrar by 71-year-old Arthur Vanhoutteghem and 33-year-old Godfried Demey, both neighbors of the place of death. Marie Elodie died at Nijverheidsstraat 85 in Waregem, while her residence was Statiestraat 85 in Olsene. The street has been renamed Zeswegenstraat and Muizelstraat.

The address Muizelstraat 85 is where the author attended high school from 1989 to 1993 (Koninklijk Atheneum, Waregem). According to witnesses, the name has changed, but not the house numbers. If so, she died 200 m from the home of her daughter Judith, who lived on the same street across from the junction, near the church 'Gaverke,' at the current address designation 'Zeswegenstraat 93' . An image is shown in Chapter 44.5.8.

Another witness claims that number 88 is 108 now (in Zeswegenstraat). If so, then the former number 85 is likely the current number 93, meaning that Marie Elodie Devenyn must have died at the home of Judith Declercq and Robert Courtens, shown in Chapter 44.5.8.

The family bond creeps through time and distance, even when paths do not directly intersect. The author attended high school between 1989 and 1993, merely 200 meters from Judith's home. During those formative years, they remained strangers, the author unaware of their profound connection.

Yet, as life unfolded its intricate narrative, Judith, with quiet dedication, began to trace the lines of the author's journey. She meticulously collected every piece of information she could find, cherishing his appearances in newspapers and celebrating his research and career from afar.

It is often said that the blood always creeps where it cannot go, and in this tale, it rings true. Unseen and unnoticed, the family

At midday, she was born on December 11, near the farm of the Declercqs in the suburb called 'Hof van Brussel' after the farm of Declercq. Possibly her parents were Declercq's neighbors. Her father was 44-year-old farmer Leo Devenyn, who was born and residing at Wielsbeke. Her mother was 41-year-old farmer Ursula Vereecke, born in Meulebeke and living in Wielsbeke.*

bond perseveres, finding its way through unseen channels and unspoken words. Judith's careful watch over the author and her unwavering interest in his achievements speak to the enduring strength of familial ties. These ties, though unseen, form a silent current, connecting hearts and souls across the years and miles. It appears that in the quiet corridors of time, the family bond remains a beacon, illuminating the paths of those connected by blood, even when unaware of the intricate dance of destiny that binds them.

44.3.3 Life and Blood-Relatives of Marie Elodie Devenyn

Marie Elodie was a daughter and only child of Leopold Devenyn and Ursula Vereecke. Leopold Devenyn was a son of Pierre Francois Devenyn and Sophie Derijcke, whose wedding is shown in Figure 44.17; he was born in 1832, and he died at Wielsbeke in 1895; he had roots in Otegem, Zwevegem, Wortegem, and Anzegem.

Ursula Vereecke was a farmer, born at Meulebeke in 1836 as the daughter of Pierre Vereecke, who died in the year that Ursula was born and had roots in Meulebeke and of Thérèse Vermeulen, with roots in Oostrozebeke. Ursula died in Wielsbeke in 1910.

Marie Elodie Devenyn, a woman of remarkable fortitude and foresight, faced profound personal losses early in life. She lost her father at the age of 19 and her mother at the age of 34.

She married at 25 after living alone with her mother, Ursula Vereecke, for six years. Ursula was raised without a father, which influenced Marie Elodie's character and determination. Their home was near Declercq, Hof van Brussel, in Wielsbeke.

Marie Elodie's early experiences likely instilled a deep resolve to ensure her children received the best possible education. She was forward-thinking and devoted to planning and preparing for the future. Despite her challenges, she was unwavering in her commitment to her children's education, treating her sons and daughters equally in academics, a progressive stance for her time.

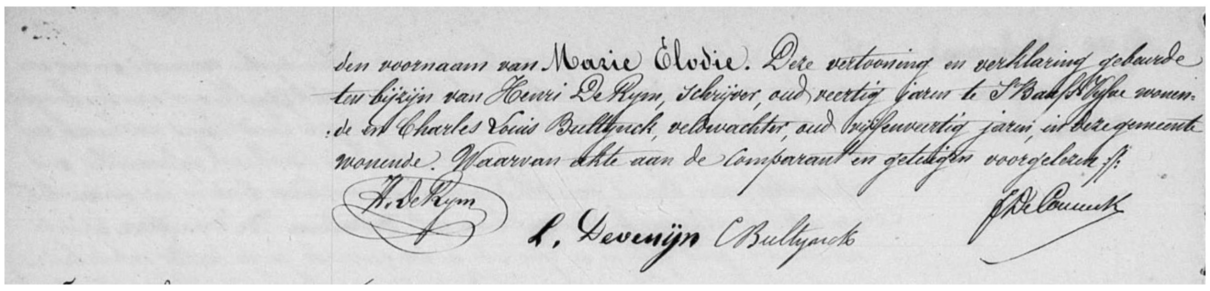
During the severe economic crisis of the 1930s in Belgium, Marie Elodie continued to invest in her children's education, even utilizing funds from her son, Michel Declercq, and his wife, Irma Lesage. The outbreak of WWII made it challenging to repay this debt. Still, Marie Elodie honored her commitments by selling her farm in Wielsbeke after the war, ensuring all her children had completed their education and the borrowed money was returned.

In the post-war period, on April 23, 1945, Marie Elodie moved with Ernest Constant Declercq to Olsene, Statiestraat 100, near her daughter Rachelle Declercq.

Following Ernest Constant's death in 1947, she moved again, likely to her daughter's residence in Waregem. The family's movements, including the farm sale, were possibly influenced by deteriorating health and the practicalities of managing family assets. Judith Declercq looked after her.

After being repaid, Michel Declercq and Irma Lesage built a beautiful home in Deerlijk for their large family.

A photograph from this period, in Figure 44.12, taken during the confirmation of their eldest daughter, Agnes Declercq, features



den voornaam van Marie Elodie. Deze vertooning en verklaring gebeurde ten bijzijn van Henri De Ryn, schrijver, oud veertig jaren te St Baafs Vyve wonen-geboren te Wielsbeke op 11 december 1876 en godvruchtig in de Heer ontslapen te Waregem op 25 januari 1964, gesterkt door de genademiddelen van de H. Kerk en de Pauselijke segen.

...„al wie gelooft, al sterft hij ook, zal leven! Aanvaardt gij dat ?" Op deze vraag van de Heer is het schone leven van de dierbare overledene een ononderbroken bevestigend antwoord geweest: Ja, Heer, ik geloof.

Het was dit geloof dat haar de kracht gaf alle levensomstandigheden, met een lach of een traan, uit Gods Vaderhand te aanvaarden.

Het was dit geloof dat de stuwkracht vormde van de onbegrensde liefde waarmee zij haar gezin opbouwde: van de moederlijke toewijding waarmee zij haar kinderen omringde en van de hartelijke genegenheid die zij haar dierbaren betoonde.

Het was dit geloof dat de bron was van haar levensvreugde die, zelfs als het minder goed ging, de guitige tinteling in haar ogen hield en een glimlach op haar mild gelaat toverde.

Lieve Moeder en Grootmoeder, wij danken U om het heerlijke testament dat U ons nalaat: echte vroomheid, offerzin en werksaamheid, goedheid en liefde. Zo dikwijls hebben wij U herinneringen horen ophalen over „hemelveerdegem". Uw levenswijze heeft U vaardig gemaakt voor de hemel. Wij bidden opdat God uw schone ziel genadig moge ontvangen. Bid gij voor ons opdat wij even hemelvaardig mogen door het leven gaan en elkaar daar voor altijd mogen terugvinden.

Marie Elodie Devenyn's life was marked by resilience, dedication, and an unwavering commitment to the well-being and education of her children. Her legacy is one of honor and inspiration, reflecting the values of perseverance and equality that she so diligently upheld.

We show the marriage certificate of her grandparents, Pierre Francois Devenyn and Sophie Derycke, in Figure 44.17. Note that Pierre François Devenyn's first wife, Monique Deriemackere, was born in Zwevegem on July 28, 1783, and he married her at Anzegem on September 9, 1814.

When Pierre François Devenyn married Isabelle Rose Seyns, he already had several children: Leo Devenyn, born in Zevegem who died at Wielsbeke on November 19, 1827, at the age of 9; Pierre Devenyn, born in Zwevegem who died on November 23, 1827, at the age of 10; Ida Devenyn, born in Wortegem, who died in Wielsbeke on March 12, 1830 at the age of 8 in Figure 44.19; Virginie Devenyn, who married Frederic Veys at Wielsbeke on October 1, 1841 and whose obituary is shown in Figure 44.18; Amelie Devenyn who married Jean Lapierre at Wielsbeke on April 28, 1854; Joseph Devenyn, who married Rosalie Veys at Sint-Baafs-Vijve on July 20, 1861; and Amelie Devenyn, born in Zwevegem, who died in Wielsbeke at the age of 80 on November 18, 1900.

Pierre François Devenyn, the grandfather of Marie Elodie, died at Wielsbeke in 1865 in Figure 44.20. He lived in the area 'Molens' in Wielsbeke and was born in Wortegem.

Ursula Vereecke, Leo Devenyn's wife and Marie Elodie's mother, died in Wielsbeke in 1910 in Figure 44.23. She was a farmer and lived in 'Gavers' in Wielsbeke at 1 km from Hof van Brussel, where the Declercqs lived.

Figure 44.24 shows the death certificate of Pierre François Devenyn. He had a son, Pierre François Devenyn, grandfather of Marie Elodie Devenyn, and son of Isabelle Rose Seyns (who died in Wortegem in 1804).

Sophie Derycke, Marie Elodie's grandmother and Pierre Francois Devenyn's wife, died in Wielsbeke in 1874 in Figure 44.25. An interesting fact is that Pierre François Devenyn, grandfather of Marie Eldodie Devenyn and son of Pierre François Devenyn and Isabelle Rose De Seyns, was born on October 14, 1789. DNA evidence is given in Chapter 73.8 on page 1590. Hence, his mother was pregnant during the French Revolution.

In Figure 44.26, the birth of Leo Devenyn's sister is shown, and in Figure 44.27, the death of his brother Louis.

Their wedding, in Figure 44.28, was in 1901 at Wielsbeke, shown in Figures 44.29. The document indicates that the groom was a farmer, born at Wielsbeke on July 28, 1872, and the son of 55-year-old farmer Ivo Declercq (DC13) and 52-year-old farmer Mathilde

The bride was a farmer, born at Wielsbeke on December 11, 1876, and daughter of Leo Devenyn, who died at Wielsbeke on December 31, 1893, and a 65-year-old farmer, Ursula Vereecke. The latter lived in Wielsbeke and agreed with the marriage.

44.5 Their Family Life and Offspring

Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn had the following children:
Jozef Antonius Gerardus Declercq (1902-1980) (DC15c), born on June 12, 1902, in Wielsbeke.
Maria Antoinette Gerarda Declercq (Wielsbeke 1904 - Malèves 1983) (DC15b), born on April 24, 1904, in Wielsbeke.
Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (Wielsbeke 1906 - Deerlijk 1963) (DC15), born on March 14, 1906, in Wielsbeke. He is the grandfather of the author of this book. His birth registration witnesses were Jean François Vereecke, a farmer who was 70 years old and an inhabitant of Ardooie, and Bernard Galle, who was 72 years old, a farmer and an inhabitant of Wielsbeke. Four descending generations of Ernest Constant through Michel are shown in Figure 44.32.
Alida Maria Juliana Declercq (Wielsbeke 1908-1908) (DC15d), born on March 2, 1908, in Wielsbeke. She died at a very young age.
Valentine Alida Declercq (Wielsbeke 1910 - Olsene 1939) (DC15e) was born on February 13, 1910, in Wielsbeke; She was born one hour before Valentine's Day.
Rachelle Gabriëlle Declercq (Wielsbeke 1912 - Anzegem 2007) (DC15f), born on March 16, 1912, in Wielsbeke.
Esther Ernestina Godeliva Declercq (Sister Ernestine) (Wielsbeke 1915 - Anzegem 2011) (DC15g), born on November 7, 1915, in Wielsbeke. Her birth registration witness was Elodie Van Den Broucke.
Judith Flavia Maria Declercq (Wielsbeke 1918 - Waregem 2007) (DC15h), born on July 30, 1918, in Wielsbeke. Her birth registration witness was Ivo Van den Broucke, 65 years old, a farmer, and an inhabitant of Wielsbeke.
The children of the Declercq-Devenyn family, shown in Figure 44.31, all went to college, which was remarkable at that time, given that they lived in a tiny village. The girls went to Middle school in Anzegem (Saint Vincent de Paul), while the boys went to Middle School in Kortrijk (Sint Amands College). Consequently, the girls had higher education in Bruges (Sint Andries Normaalschool, specialized in educating girls to become teachers). In contrast, the boys had theirs at Ghent at the Jesuit College of Saint Barbara.
Ernest Constant Declercq, depicted in Figure 44.33, and Marie Elodie Devenyn resided at the Hof van Brussel farm in Wielsbeke, an inheritance they managed with diligence. The origin of the name 'Hof van Brussel' is discussed in Chapter 39.6 and Chapter 42.
Ernest Constant married Marie Elodie Devenyn, shown in Figure 44.35, who was a strong-willed neighbor and had experienced the loss of her father several years before their marriage. Marie Elodie's mother, having been raised without her father, who died the year she was born, undoubtedly served as a paragon of resilience and fortitude for her daughter.
Ernest Constant and Marie Elodie were advocates of gender equality and understood the critical importance of education for both boys and girls. They meticulously planned and allocated resources, even during the economic hardships of the 1930s, to ensure their children could continue their schooling. They utilized funds from Michel and Irma to support the younger children's education, a testament to their prioritization of learning.
After the war, Ernest Constant and Marie Elodie fulfilled their financial obligations by selling the farm, demonstrating their steadfast commitment to keeping promises and the integrity of the Declercq family. This action reflects their unwavering adherence to their word and the value they placed on education and familial responsibility.
We found evidence that the family housed Emile Theophile Lesage and his son Paul Lesage near the end of WWI when he was a refuge expelled from Ledegem, where the Germans had cleared the village, as described in Chapter 64.6.1.5. Their friendship continued after the war and was translated into regular merchandising of flax.
In Chapter 44.8, we also describe a picture taken at Deerlijk in 1933, in which Ernest Constant is seen together with Paul Lesage and many others.
Under these casual circumstances, their son Michel Declercq (DC15) would meet Irma Lesage, the youngest daughter of Emile Lesage, and would marry. They are the grandparents of the author.

Ernest Constant (DC14) and Marie Elodie were friends with Maurice Demedts, Celeste Vandenhede, André and Gabrielle Demedts's parents. Their children[1] were also friends and exchanged books and knowledge.

The family also knew Hugo Verriest[2] very well, which may have been one reason, early in the 1950s, for Michel and Irma to move to Saint Louis in Deerlijk, described in Chapter 45.5 and Chapter 45.6.

Ernest Constant and Marie Elodie were also acquainted with the families of de Nieulant et de Pottelsberghe and Vanderbruggen at Wielsbeke, described in Chapter 44.12.

Consultation of the registers at Olsene revealed (sic):

'Bij nazicht van de bevolkingsregisters blijkt dat Dhr. en Mevr. Ernest Declercq - Marie-Elodie Devenyn in Olsene, Statiestraat 100 ingeschreven waren op 31/12/1940 komende van Wielsbeke, Hof van Brussel. Op 20/07/1942 zijn zij terug vertrokken naar hetzelfde adres in Wielsbeke. Op 23/04/1945 zijn zij dan opnieuw ingeschreven op het adres Statiestraat 100 in Olsene.'

This means that at the end of Ernest Constant's life (DC14), the couple moved close to their daughter Rachelle Declercq. When Marie Elodie died, her address was Statiestraat 85, which indicates that she probably resided at the home of her daughter and was no longer alone.

At the beginning of WWII, they decided to give up farming and live with their daughter Rachelle in Olsene when she married Maurice Wullaert. Maurice was a widower and former husband of their daughter, Valentine, who died in 1939.

When the coast was clear, they returned to Wielsbeke. Finally, they returned, perhaps because of health issues, to their daughter in April 1945, almost one year after the German occupation of Wielsbeke, shown in Figure 44.36, ended and just before WWII ceased in Belgium. Some aerial views of Hof van Brussel are shown in Figures 44.37, 44.38, 44.39 and 44.39, and a view from the street is shown in Figure 44.40.

44.5.1 Joseph Antonius Gerardus Declercq

I

44.5.1.1 Introduction

Joseph Antonius Gerardus Declercq was the only brother of Michel Declercq (DC15) and was destined to become a farmer, which he remained until his death.

We know he was a charming, righteous man who lived a quiet life. He died at the age of 87 and was married to Zozyma Tacq. His birth record is shown in Figure 44.41.

Like Michel Declercq, he studied in Ghent as seen in Figure 44.42. As a young adult, also seen in Figure 44.42, he became military in Figure 44.43.

Courageously, she moved to Malève near Jodoigne in 1951. She was the sister of Michel Declercq (DC15). Like Judith Declercq, Maria (1904-1983) studied in Anzegem and later in Bruges and became a nurse. She worked as a midwife. She married Gerard Galle (1909-1989) in 1934. The couple lived in Izegem, where all or most of their children were born, and they moved later to Malève near Jodoigne in 1951. Their descendants still live there.
Interestingly, in the context of our earliest ancestors in Belgium, the names Jerome (Jeroni), Antoon (Antoni), and Michel (Miguel) appear as the names of her children. The author found Cindy Galle and her father, Michel, a few years before the publication of this book. They were very friendly and open-hearted. It's adorable to retrieve a distant family member and still feel a blood connection.
We show a citation from a letter received on February 6, 2018, by the author from Michel Galle (1942), through his daughter Cindy Galle (1980),
Maria's presence at the funeral of Michel Declercq is also revealed in Figure 44.49, while her obituary card and tomb are shown in Figure 44.53.

44.5.3 Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15)

Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) is the author's grandfather and is extensively described in Chapter 45.

44.5.4 Alida Maria Juliana Declercq

The family endured an unimaginable tragedy with the loss of Alida Maria Juliana Declercq, who passed away after just 25 days. This heartbreak is starkly illustrated by Figures 44.54 and 44.55. The death of a child is the deepest sorrow a parent can endure, an agony beyond the reach of words. This profound loss has indelibly marked the family's lives, casting a shadow that will linger for years. Adding to their grief, the family later lost another child, Valentine Declercq, who died shortly after marriage. While a

'Als één van ons moet gaan, laat mij het dan maar zijn'. Dat was vaders wens.
Het afscheid doet pijn. Vaders heengaan treft ons onverwacht. We wisten het wel: hij was oud en had een rijk gevuld leven achter de rug, maar niemand staat een geliefde graag af.

Hij was boer en bleef dat heel zijn leven, zelfs als hij ouder werd en minder krachten had. Met plezier kapte en hakte hij erop los. Het land was zijn leven. Binnen zitten was niets voor hem. Hij was trots op de beesten en de vruchten die hij kweekte.

Een goede echtgenoot was hij voor zijn vrouw, met wie hij zovele lange levensdagen mocht doorbrengen. Hij had geen enkel verstand van huishouden, maar waardeerde des te meer wat zij presteerde.

Hij was een goede vader voor zijn kinderen en kleinkinderen. Zijn levensdagen waren niet altijd even gemakkelijk. De soms harde zorgen hebben hem echt mens gemaakt. Maar telkens weer vergat hij eigen leed om mee te leven met de vreugden en de zorgen van elk kind, elk kleinkind.

De mensen - hij kon ze niet missen. Als vader niet ergens aan het werken was, stond of zat hij te praten met familie, kennissen of buren. 'Ge moet zo vlug niet weggaan, ge hebt nog wel een beetje tijd.' Hij kende iedereen, vroeg naar mensen en dingen die wij soms al lang vergeten waren. Hoeveel keer is hij niet komen vragen om een kaartje of een brief naar vrienden te schrijven.

We zullen je niet licht vergeten, vader, en danken je voor alles wat je voor ons deed.
Moge Gods eeuwige rust over jou komen en moge Hij je edelmoedig en toegewijd leven bekronen met Zijn heerlijkheid.

Het is voorbij moeder, je bent vredig ontslapen in de Heer. God weze je genadig.

Je strijd is hard geweest. Je wist dat je het ziekenhuis nooit meer zou verlaten. Moedig en zonder klagen ben je de weg gegaan - op je eentje - tot je zeggen kon : ik heb mijn tijd gehad. Om mij moet je niet wenen.

Biddend gaf je je over aan Gods wil.

Dank je moeder om wat je voor ons betekend hebt. We zagen je graag, elk op zijn manier. Je was een taaie boerenvrouw die wist wat werken inhield en die de pijn en de tegenslagen van het leven keer op keer verbeten droeg. Klagen waren we van jou niet gewend. Alleen in je huisje na de dood van je man, heb je verder geleefd, gewerkt en gedeeld in de vreugden en de zorgen van je kinderen en kleinkinderen. En rondom jou waren er de vrienden en de buren die af en toe binnenliepen en zo dikwijls de nodige boodschappen hebben gedaan. We vergeten je niet moeder en we bidden : moge de Heer je opnemen in zijn licht.

'Alles is ijdelheid.
Alleen het diep beminnen en je Bron daarbij ontginnen, gaat niet voorbij, gaat nooit voorbij.
Alleen héél diep beminnen,
en God daarbij ontginnen,
gaat niet voorbij, gaat nooit voorbij'.

VALETINE - ALIDA DECLERCQ
echtgenoote van MAURICE WULLAERT
geboren te Wielsbeke den 13 Februari 1910 en godvruchtig overleden te Olsene den 28 December 1939, versterkt door de troostmiddelen onzer Moeder de H. Kerk.

Wie God vreest moet den dood niet vreezen want hij zal hem een groote bron van geluk zijn.

Zij was een voorbeeld van diep geloof en sterke deugd, alleen bekommerd om 't welzijn van haar echtgenoot. Een zware ziekte heeft haar gestel uitgeput, en na een hopeloozen strijd waarin menschelijke hulp niet mocht baten, na veel pijn en lijden is zij bezweken. Maar nooit heeft zij geduld noch moed verloren, hopend en gelaten, heeft zij alles gedragen tot het bittere einde.

Haar laatste woorden waren een dankgebed tot God om al het goede dat zij van Hem gedurende haar leven mocht ontvangen.

Beminde echtgenoot, wij hadden samen schoone toekomstplannen gemaakt; de dood komt dit alles nu verijdelen. Vergeet niet de liefde welke ik u heb toegedragen. Wees niet ontroostbaar in uwe droefheid; in den schoonen hemel zullen wij weer vereenigd worden.

Duurbare ouders, broeders en zusters, ik verlaat dit dal van tranen om de eeuwige vreugde te genieten. Ik zal u in den hemel niet vergeten, vooral u niet die mij in mijn laatste levensdagen zoo getrouwvol hebt bijgestaan.

Vaartwel; ik reken op uw alle gebeden opdat God mijn ziel barmhartig weze; gij vooral, mijne aan God toegewijde zuster, gedenk mij in uw H. Communiën en gebeden.

44.5.5 Valentine Declercq

Valentine Alida Declercq was Gabrielle Demedts'[3] closest friend and the beloved sister of Michel Declercq (DC15). Her untimely death left an indelible mark on her family. Valentine was born on February 13, 1910, the day before Saint Valentine's Day, and passed away on December 28, 1939—exactly 36 years, minus a few hours, before the author's birth. Her family named her Valentine in homage to Saint Valentine, celebrated on February 14, just hours after her birth. Tragically, they could not have foreseen that she would pass away at the peak of her life shortly after her marriage.

A poignant photograph of Valentine reposing on her deathbed is too painful to show in full; therefore, only a glimpse is provided in Figure 44.56. It is believed that she died of leukemia. The loss of such a vibrant and beautiful young woman was unimaginable for her family.

Valentine studied in Brugge, likely at the Sint Andreas Normaalschool, which specialized in educating girls to become school teachers. Her close friend Gabrielle Demedts, a leading Flemish poet, composed a touching poem, included below, when Valentine fell ill. They were the same age, both born in 1910, as depicted in Figure 44.58. Valentine's beauty is evident in Figures 44.56 and 44.57.

As a young woman, Valentine was engaged to Daniel Lesage, shown in Figure 44.59 and described in Chapter 64.7.12.5. Figure 44.60 shows a keepsake from that period. When Valentine and Daniel Lesage parted ways in early 1934, Gabrielle Demedts wrote the poem 'Rustig Lied'[4] (Quiet Song) to capture Valentine's emotions. This poem symbolically uses the snow to represent a bride's veil and refers to Daniel Lesage's upcoming marriage to Magdalena Meersseman and the hope for a future marriage for Valentine. Chapter 64 reveals that Valentine had also been the love of Daniel Lesage's life, but he felt compelled to comply with an arranged marriage to Magdalena Meersseman instead.

Valentine's story is a poignant testament to the complexities of love and loss, leaving a legacy of profound emotional impact on those who knew and loved her.

Rustig lied

Onder het raam, in de aarde, die sporen die me dierbaar zijn.
Toen hij kwam, wie zond hem weg? Ik zond hem weg;
het deed geen pijn.
Het deed geen pijn; maar iets is verdwenen of dood in mij.
Mijn gedachten staan, als soldaten gehoorzaam,
in rechte rij.
Op een nacht valt de sneeuw, maakt de aarde wit, maakt de aarde rein.
De randen van mijn oogen doen pijn;
het komt door de slaap, het komt door de sneeuw, het komt door die sporen die niet te vinden meer zijn.

Clearly, Valentine remained single for a couple of years before she would decide the marry someone. Meanwhile, in 1936, Gabrielle Demedts wrote another poem, 'Lage tonen'[5] to express her emotions.

Lage tonen.

Sterven doe je niet ineens
Maar af en toe een beetje
En alle beetjes die je stierf,
't is vreemd, maar die vergeet je.
Het is je dikwijls zelf ontgaan,
Je zegt "ik ben wat moe",
Maar op een keer dan ben je aan je laatste beetje toe.

De families DE CLERCQ - DEVENIJN,
De families WULLAERT - CHRISTIAENS,

Danken u voor uw medeleven.

Een confrontatie met de dood is altijd onaangenaam. Hoe oud de overledene ook is, het blijft altijd pijnlijk om van iemand definitief afscheid te nemen.
Is een leeftijd van 96 jaar oud genoeg om te sterven?

Was je zachte levenseinde geen welkome oplossing om je uit je penibele situatie te bevrijden? De laatste tijd was je eerst zo ontzettend verward, daarna was je een onomkeerbaar comateuze patient. Was sterven voor jou een nieuwjaarsgeschenk?

Niet iedereen krijgt de kans om in relatief goede gezondheid zo oud te worden. Je overlijden was een triestige gebeurtenis maar ondanks dat, verheugen wij ons over de hoge leeftijd die je mocht bereiken.

Misschien is er een last van ons weggevallen maar toch zullen we je missen.

Vaarwel ma, vaarwel mémé, vaarwel superoma … en bedankt voor ons zachtjes te verlaten.

Je nakomelingen

Que dire de cet Homme dont le nom résonne de par le monde !

Que dire de ce Prêtre qui depuis plus d'un demi siècle monte les degrés de l'autel pour immoler l'Agneau immaculé !

Il fut fidèle à sa devise : Apôtre de Jésus-Christ.

Apôtre de Jésus-Christ, le Cardinal Mercier le fut pendant un épiscopat de vingt années avec toute l'intensité d'une âme brûlant d'amour pour Dieu et son Christ, de saint zèle pour la gloire de l'Église et le bien des âmes ; Apôtre de Jésus-Christ il le fut jusque dans sa dernière maladie, où il donna l'exemple de la plus sereine soumission à la volonté de Dieu et d'une activité que la mort seule a pu briser.

Ik ben niet moe, ik ben niet oud doodsverlangen heb ik niet.
De dagen gaan, de jaren gaan, ongebroken buigt het riet.
Aan géén leed wil ik ontkomen;
maar de droefheid zoek ik niet.
Roekeloosheid is lang verzwonden met den droom die mij verliet.
Hopeloos, maar onweerstaanbaar mischt in mij een heel oud lied, van eindeloos en groot verlangen naar u, naar u dien ik verliet.

Valentine married Maurice Wullaert in Figure 44.61 in 1938. Destiny ended her life too soon the year after. Her obituary card is shown in Figure 44.56.

As indicated, the death of Valentine Declercq has left a shock for many decades. The author remembers that his father (DC16) mentioned her several times, even though he had never met her. Michel Declercq (DC15) probably talked often about his deceased sister, Valentine. Later generations haven't named any girl 'Valentine.' Perhaps they felt that the honor only belonged to the handsome and joyful sister or auntie and should not be reused. Otherwise, they feared that the name was associated with the early loss of a beloved child.

In 1939, during Valentine's illness, Gabrielle Demedts wrote the poem for Valentine called 'Zomer.' Gabrielle was eight months older than Valentine, and they were close friends. Valentine died at the end of that year, on December 28. To understand the poem, one must remember that Valentine became sick just after she was married, so instead of enjoying the summer (zomer) of her life and looking forward to having children, she fell ill. She suddenly faced the end of her life, which was devastating and struck Gabrielle Demedts, whence she wrote the poem[6]:

Zomer

Is dit de zomer wel?
Ik zie geen rijpend ooft,
ik hoor geen kinderspel;
heb ik in God geloofd?

Ik heb op God gebouwd en, ach, zoo vast vertrouwd dat Hij nie knakken zou dien ik genezen wou;

genezen kon een korte stond
tot d' onrust weerom wortel schoot, ontvreemdend u den goeden grond, ontvreemdend mij mijn goed genoot.

De dagen gaan door het verdriet, de nachten gaan en 't zomert niet;
mijn Lente was verbeeldingsspel, seizoenen zijn mij van geen tel.

Er is geen rijpend ooft, dit is de zomer niet,
ik heb in God geloofd,
Geloof begeef mij niet.

Mijn lief, voor u, moog' t zomer zijn, die ik niet meer nabij zal zijn;

het leven is niet goed voor mij.

44.5.6 Rachelle Gabrielle Declercq

Rachelle, the biblical figure, is also described in Chapter 49.6 as guardian of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc.
Rachelle Gabrielle Declercq was the author's father's godmother. She was born in Wielsbeke on March 16, 1912, in Figure 44.62, and died at Anzegem on December 31, 2007. She was buried at Olsene on January 5, 2008. Her husband was Maurice Wullaert, Valentine's widower, and their marriage is shown in Figure 44.63.
She studied in Bruges at the Sint Andreas Normaalschool, which specialized in educating girls to become school teachers.
Even when she was of respectable age, she could list many facts about geography, such as listing all the cities of a given country from the top of her head. She also spoke French fluently and has taught French, in addition to regular classes, to children. Pictures of her are shown in Figures 44.64.
Her death announcement and obituary card are shown in Figures 44.65 and 44.66. Her tomb at the cemetery of Olsene is also shown in Figure 44.66.

44.5.7 Esther Ernestina Godeliva Declercq

44.5.7.1 Introduction

Esther, the biblical figure, is also described in Chapter 49.6 as guardian of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc.
Esther Ernestine Declercq is the author's grand-auntie, born on November 7, 1915, in Wielsbeke. She studied first at Anzegem, then in Bruges, and then at the 'Normaalschool' at Sint Andries. Becoming a teacher was indeed her vocation, combined with becoming a religious nun of Saint Vincentius 'a Paulo in Anzegem, likely inspired by Cardinal Mercier, whose obituary card is shown in Figure 44.69. She is well-known as a Catholic Sister, as in Figure 44.70. She died in 2011 at the age of 96.
She has been a primary and secondary school teacher in general subjects, mainly French and Music. From 1943 until 1956, she was a school Director at Ingooigem, replacing Irma Cottenier. At Ingooigem, she was also close with writer Stijn Streuvels and his family, shown with André Demedts in Figure 44.71. Ingooigem must have been appealing to her because it was the last village where the priest and writer Hugo Verriest (Deerlijk 1840 - Ingooigem 1922) had lived, who was well known by Ernestine's father, Ernest Constant Declercq.
Simultaneously, she has worked at the Women's Jail of Bruges ('Kleine Refuge' and 'Grote Refuge' of Sint Andries). On November 18, 1958, when she was 43 years old, she became a Missionary at Uvira in Congo, where she taught French classes. After being taken hostage at Uvira, she returned to Belgium, where she became the school Director at Mannekensvere while continuing her Jail Ministry. At the end of her career, she lived at the monastery of Anzegem. Sister Ernestine is well-known for her educational role and her captivity in Congo.
As a child, the author had heard about 'Zuster Ernestine' occasionally, but he had never met her, at least not as far as he can remember. He met her finally for the first time around 1999. She left a deep impression, was very knowledgeable, even in physics, and talked about Michel Declercq (DC15) in a way as if he was still alive. It was the first time that the author heard someone talk about his grandfather so openly. When the author spoke about his education (he was studying physics at the Catholic University of Leuven), she immediately replied that she was not surprised. "Our family have been brilliant students," she replied. She also talked about her friends and fellow nuns who had been active in Sri Lanka for many years. The author is still very appreciative of her and this meaningful chat.

44.5.7.2 Stijn Streuvels

During Ernestine's activity as school principal at Ingooigem (1943-1956), she had the opportunity to become more intimately acquainted with writer Stijn Streuvels and his family. Stijn Streuvels, shown in Figure 44.71, was a pseudonym for Frank Lateur (Heule 1871 - Ingoogem 1969) and was naturally well known by the clan of the Declercqs and Demedts.
Stijn Streuvels also appears in the picture of 1933, discussed in Chapter 44.8, with Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14).

44.5.7.3 Karel Jonckheere

Karel Jonckheere (Ostend 1906) was a writer and globetrotter and was three weeks younger than Michel Declercq (DC15) (Wielsbeke 1906) and has known Michel's friend writer Andre Demedts (Wielsbeke 1906).
It is unknown if Michel has known Karel personally, but Michel likely read works published by Karel, and so did his sisters. It is even expected that some of his works[7][8][9], inspired by journeys to Congo and other countries, were known to Esther Ernestina Godelieve Declercq (Sister Ernestine) when she decided to become a missionary in Belgian Congo end of 1958.

44.5.7.4 Her Adventure in Congo 1958-1964

On November 18, 1958, at 43, Sister Ernestine, born Esther Declercq, embarked on her mission to Uvira in Congo, where she taught French classes. This event was commemorated with a memorial card, highlighting the significance of her new journey (see Figure 44.73). During her tenure in Congo, Sister Ernestine fulfilled her educational responsibilities and undertook medical duties, as depicted in Figures 44.74 and 44.75. Her integration into the community and enjoyment of her work is evident in Figure 44.76 and Figure 44.77. Figure 44.78 presents an artistic impression of her mission. Renowned for her intelligence and empathy, Sister Ernestine played a pivotal role in negotiating with the rebels at Uvira during her captivity.
In 1964, the eastern region of the newly independent Republic of Congo was engulfed by the Simba Rebellion, a significant and brutal conflict during the Congo Crisis. The Simba Rebellion was led by leftist militants who opposed the central government and sought to implement a radical socio-political transformation. The rebellion was part of a larger wave of post-colonial violence and instability that plagued Congo following its independence from Belgium in 1960. The rebellion's name, Simba, meaning lion in Swahili, indicated the ferocity and strength the rebels aimed to project.
Amidst this turmoil, rebellion leader Gaston Soumialot orchestrated the kidnapping of a group of Belgian and Italian Catholic Sisters, including Sister Ernestine, from Uvira. The capture of these religious figures was a strategic move intended to leverage international attention and pressure. The Sisters were subjected to forced labor and endured numerous atrocities, which were reported by news agencies worldwide, drawing global condemnation. Uvira's strategic location near the border with Burundi made it a crucial supply route for the rebels, further complicating the situation.
The capture and subsequent treatment of the Sisters highlighted the severe human rights violations perpetrated during the rebellion. The international community, including the United Nations, strongly condemned these acts. The kidnapping represented a dramatic escalation in the conflict and underscored the vulnerability of foreign nationals and missionaries in the region.
On October 7, 1964, a Western military operation successfully liberated the kidnapped Sisters. This operation was part of a broader effort by Western nations to stabilize the region and protect their nationals. The Sisters were escorted from Uvira to Bukavu, where they were flown back to Belgium. Their safe return was a moment of relief and triumph, yet it left an indelible mark on those involved.
Sister Ernestine's return to Belgium did not mark the end of her service. She assumed the role of School Director at Mannekensvere and continued her involvement in jail ministry, demonstrating her resilience and unwavering commitment to her faith and community. Her strength and determination are evident, as shown in Figure 44.70.

Left, we see the author with his daughter Anna-Laura and youngest son Lambert at the Afrikamuseum of Tervuren near Brussels, in 2013. H.M. King Leopold II established the museum. At the time of our visit, it was a time-capsule of colonial thought and, therefore, fascinating from a historical perspective. Unfortunately, the museum has been completely modernised since then, and therefore, this historical value has been wiped out. (Declercq de Silva Archive)*

The kidnapping of Catholic Sisters during the Simba Rebellion is a poignant example of the intersection of religion, colonial legacies, and conflict in post-colonial Africa. The incident underscores the perils missionaries and foreign nationals faced amidst political instability and highlights the broader implications of the Congo Crisis on international relations and humanitarian efforts.

44.5.7.5 Her Retirement

After she retired from her education duties, Ernestine ultimately resided at the end of her life in Anzegem at a 'home for the elderly,' shown in Figure 44.79.

44.5.7.6 Her Death in 2011

Her death announcement and obituary card are shown in Figures 44.80 and 44.81. The author attended the funeral and was impressed by the status and dignity, as well as the simplicity and humbleness of the ceremony. It reflected her character of greatness and simplicity, strength and compassion. Her tomb is shown in Figure 44.81.

44.5.7.7 Some Memorabilia

The postcard in Figure 44.82 reads,
'Mr Emile Lesage, Farmer, Spilstraat, Beselare. Dear Irma, I received your note with great joy. I will never forget that day when I came to you, and maybe I will return this summer. I hope we will have just as much fun again. I long to see you again, since it's been a year since I've seen you. See you again, and in the meantime, I offer you my best regards, Esther.'
Other memorabilia are shown in Figures 44.82 and 44.83.

44.5.8 Judith Flavia Maria Declercq

44.5.8.1 Introduction

Judith, the biblical figure, is also described in Chapter 49.6 as guardian of la Mare de Déu de la Serra de Montblanc.
Judith Flavia Maria Declercq (Wielsbeke, Belgium, July 30, 1918 – Waregem, Belgium, March 3, 2007) has been the President of the children's welfare organization and was the youngest child of Ernest Constant Declercq.
She studied in Anzegem, shown in Figure 44.84, and later in Bruges at nursing school 'Elisabethverpleegsterschool.' She was married to Robert Courtens, a high-school teacher and, as far as we have been told, school director[10] at Waregem.
Judith as a child can be seen in Figure 44.85.
On her birth certificate in Figure 44.86, Ivo Van den Broucke was a witness. Ivo was a half-brother of Mathilde Van den Broucke and, therefore, a half-uncle of Ernest Constant Declercq (D10).

44.5.8.2 Her Life and Career

Judith Declercq was the Provincial President of the Belgian National Child Welfare organization. She had grown into this position because of her education, connections, and unfulfilled desire to have children.
Her father's relationship with Baron Bekaert and frequent visits to the Bekaert family helped her obtain this position. The reader

Ps. 138

In Zijn liefde heeft God uitgenodigd tot deelname aan Zijn Heerlijkheid:

ZUSTER ESTHER DE CLERCQ

Zuster van de H. Vincentius à Paulo - Anzegem geboren te Wielsbeke, 9 november 1915, aan God en aan de dienst van zijn mensen gegeven door religieuze geloften op 9 september 1936, rustig overleden te Anzegem op 22 januari 2011, gesterkt door de Ziekenzalving en de Apostolische Zegen.

In deze aangrijpende stilte nemen wij afscheid van Zuster Esther, afscheid van de wereld en de tijd, maar niet van het leven en de eeuwigheid. Wij mogen menselijk treuren om haar lichamelijke afwezigheid, maar moeten dankbaar en liefdevol voortleven in haar aanwezigheid, geestelijk verenigd in haar eeuwig geluk.

In de gezegende leeftijd van 95 jaar is Zuster Esther rustig heengegaan omringd door haar medezusters en familie. Zo is er een einde gekomen aan een levensweg vol toewijding en actieve inzet.

Altijd en overal nam zij haar verantwoordelijkheid op. Men kon steeds op haar rekenen. Zij was plichtbewust, eerlijk en rechtvaardig, vredelievend, nauwkeurig en gelijkmoedig. Een ware toevlucht was zij voor zwakken. Empathisch kon ze zich inleven in de gevoelens van de andere. Trouw was ze aan haar gebedsoefeningen.

Als onderwijzeres gebruikte ze haar talenten aanvankelijk op de Heirweg, daarna in het voorbereidend jaar van het middelbaar onderwijs in Anzegem, vervolgens als schoolhoofd in Ingooigem vanaf 1943 tot 1958. Ze was ook bewaarster bij de landloopsters en gedetineerden in de kleine Refuge en grote Refuge te Sint-Andries-Brugge. Aan de leeftijd van 43 jaar ging ze in op de vraag om naar Uvira in Oost-Kongo te vertrekken , om Afrikaanse meisjes in de Franse taal te onderwijzen, dit van 1958 tot 1964. Daar heeft zij heel angstige momenten meegemaakt door doodsbedreigingen vanwege de rebellen tijdens haar vijf maandenlange gevangenschap. Uiteindelijk werden de missionarissen door de Belgische soldaten bevrijd en kwamen veilig in België aan.

Na een korte rustperiode werd ze schoolhoofd in Mannekensvere. Na een jaar werd de Brugse Refuge bij de gedetineerden haar nieuw, maar niet onbekend werkterrein. Om het daarna wat rustiger aan te doen verbleef ze in het klooster te Anzegem, nadien te Vichte en uiteindelijk in het Woon- en Zorgcentrum Ter Berk hier ter plaatse.

De veelheid van haar verschillende engagementen zijn als zovele rozen aan de Heer aangeboden, maar die rozen hebben ook doornen gehad. Ook dit heeft in die jaren bijgedragen tot een diepere vereenzelviging met Jezus aan zijn Kruis. Liefde, vriendschap en vreugde zijn gaven die in de loutering van het vuur nog mooier worden.

DAT ZIJ MOGE RUSTEN IN DE LIEFDE VAN DE HEER!

De Zusters van de H. Vincentius en de Familie danken U voor de gebeden en blijken van deelneming.

Een rijkgevuld leven is in een gezegende ouderdom op zachte wijze voltooid. . . Met klare geest en vastberaden wil heeft vader zijn mooi gezin en bedrijf opgebouwd. De door oorlogstuigen omwoelde aarde werd, als een opdracht van de Schepper, weer tot vruchtbare grond omgevormd. Als christenmens zag hij in de kringloop van de seizoenen, in de wisselende groei van plant en dier, de grootheid van Gods werk. Dankbaar aanvaardde hij het leven uit Gods handen. Met christelijke wijsheid bekeek hij de wereld.

Heer, wij danken U om al het goede dat Gij ons door uw dienaar hebt gegeven. In zijn handel en wandel en in zijn verantwoordelijkheid voor de gemeente was hij stipt, trouw en rechtvaardig. In zijn opvattingen was hij diep-gelovig, zonder uiterlijk vertoon, een rechtschapen man en waarheidslievend. Geef ons een groot geloof en vertrouwen in Uw werking, zodat wij des te beter Uw schikkingen aanvaarden.

Hij mag met fierheid terugzien op zijn levenswerk en op zijn kinderen die hij, als eerlijk mens is voorgegaan op de rechte weg. Hij mocht van zichzelf getuigen " Ik heb de goede strijd gestreden en het geloof bewaard, mij wacht nog de kroon van gerechtigheid ".

Moge het beste van hem in ons voortleven tot Uw eer en glorie en tot het geluk van de mensen.

Mijn dierbare vrouw, samen hebben wij meer dan 50 jaar lief en leed gedeeld. De Heer zal ik bidden dat Hij je de sterkte geeft om de lasten van het leven te dragen tot wij samen weer verenigd zijn bij Hem.

Goede kinderen en kleinkinderen allemaal, heb dank voor je goede zorgen. Blijf rond moeder geschaard en wees mij in je gebeden indachtig.

Heer onze God,
zoveel jaren hebt Gij aan deze mens gezondheid en levenskracht geschonken.
Voor hem en voor ons die hij zo dierbaar en genegen was,
was het een reden om U blijvend dank te zeggen.
Nu dit leven ten einde liep, bidden wij U :

The ability to care for children's welfare must have compensated for her broken dreams. She had had her education to become a nurse at Elisabethverpleegsterschool of Brugge. As a trained nurse, she also became involved in education as a teacher.

She became one of the founders of 'Hoger Instituut voor Verpleegkunde' at Kortrijk, a college associated with the Katholieke Universiteit Leuven. The Nurse Training School 'Maria Middelares' would later become 'Hoger Instituut voor Verpleegkunde' [11]. The idea to have such a school in Kortrijk came from Dr Sebrechts, who convinced Canon Decoene to convince Dean Camerlynck. The first steps were set in 1935 by the sisters of Sint-Niklaas, with the help of the families Landas and Vermeulen. It was on October 12, 1937, that the new school was inaugurated.

One week later, the first classes were taught. The early teachers were sister Marie-Pierre, sister Marie-Xavier, and sister Hildegarde for Psychology and Pedagogy.

Simultaneously, juffrouw Judith Declercq provided technical education, and priest F. Demarez provided religion. Judith was not yet 20 years old.

The appearance of Camerlynck and Vermeulen indicates that Michel Declercq, her brother, had probably suggested Judith. He knew both families well through his wife, Irma Lesage, and his parents-in-law. Judith's young age was not a surprise. Indeed, becoming a nurse then required one year of education after high school. She was well on track.

She was an example of the early emancipation of women. She had finished her medical education and started teaching when the Second World War began, and the Germans invaded Belgium in May 1940. During the invasion, followed by the German occupation, and later during the liberation of Belgium in 1944, she worked in the field and regular hospitals.

After the war, she continued to work as the Head of maternity in Kortrijk and as a teacher. As mentioned, she also became President of the Children's Welfare Organization in West Flanders[12].

The author had the pleasure of meeting Judith and her husband, Robert, only a few times many years ago. In contrast, the author's father enjoyed the warmth of their company nearly every month, and after Judith's passing, he visited Robert almost weekly. Judith and Robert deeply admired the author, keenly following his educational journey and scientific endeavors. It is said that they meticulously clipped and preserved every newspaper article featuring the author, a testament to their unwavering support and pride. Reflecting on the past, there is a poignant regret for not sharing more moments, as their kindness and friendliness left a lasting impression.

44.6 Their Life as Farmers and Flax Merchants

44.6.1 Introduction

Etymologically, the words Flanders (Vlaanderen) and Belgium (België or Belgique) originate respectively from the Germanic word Flaum and the Celtic word Belc' h, meaning 'wetland' and 'flax' [13], or 'red hair,' are two characteristics our country has always been associated with. Indeed, even the Romans were very impressed by the flax fields. Water is needed to ret flax, while the climate and soil between the Seine and Amstel rivers are ideal for flax cultivation.

The best soils for flax are found in Flanders: fertile, intensely cultivated, richly fertilized, weed-free, and with a well-drained top layer. In other words, loamy soils, sandy, and clay soils that are not too heavy are best. The climate should be mild, relatively constant, and moist, with long periods of sun.

A problem with flax is that it cannot be cultivated continuously but must be alternated with other crops. In particular, flax may only be grown on the same plot of land every seven years. This number was probably derived partly from experience and partly from religious considerations. Flax was indeed so noble it must be divine. Usually, barley was the fruit that was grown the year before flax was sown. Later, farmers also did this after wheat. In some areas during the 19th century, flax was also sown after potato cultivation. Curiously, these traditions were so deeply ingrained that even in the 1970s and 1980s, one often saw ordinary people growing potatoes in their gardens, only to sow grass the following year to obtain a beautiful lawn. Such traditions all date back to the days of flax cultivation. Sow flax on soils where nitrogenous plants had grown was always avoided because of its lower Figure 44.94: *The compilation shows different early stages in the processing of flax. First, we find the author's eldest children on June 22, 2008, in the middle of a flax orchard in Kortrijk, in a wet spot where flax did not grow well (we avoided damage to the orchard). (Declercq de Silva Archive). Then, scenes of flax harvested by workers are shown, which is dried and then transported to the river. Flax was, for instance, placed in 'hedges' to dry before processing. Modern Flax Harvesting, 'vlas slijten' is also shown (Courtesy of Flaxbox, Zulte). The machine automatically removes the seeds before the flax plants are laid on the ground. Linseed must be dried before it can be further processed. quality. Strangely, the ground became flax weary very quickly, and flax did not grow nicely or sometimes did not bloom. If that happened, it was sometimes avoided for 30 years.

The cultivation of flax and the production of linen in the area between Normandy and Holland is probably 2000 years old. Linen, however, was not very widespread because of several reasons. Wool, for instance, was much more accessible for clothing. Shortly after Belgium's independence in 1830, linen production was boosted and formed the core business along the Leie River, soon receiving the name Golden River. For over one century, the industry prevailed in the region. By the end of the 1950s, flax in the area had lost its importance because of synthetic fibers, cheap flax, and linen exported by the Soviet Union. Flax cultivation still exists, but only for specialized applications requiring long, high-strength, and fine bio-fibers. In the Kaukasus mountains, flax fibers were found 32000 years ago when men were not even farmers. The oldest linen fabric was found in Turkey and is around 9000 years old, which is remarkable because the oldest cloth made of wool is about 6000 years old. Therefore, it is very likely that flax fibers were used for clothing and other applications much earlier than wool. The main difference between wool and linen is that flax fibers are hollow and lighter than wool, yet better isolating. It is well-known that if treated well, linen clothes last a lifetime and become softer. Flax slowly turns into silk, so to speak, because it becomes softer and whiter when dried or bleached in the sun after being washed.

It may be hard for the reader not from the Golden River area to believe that flax used to be a religion, an obsession, an identity, a source of income, and social status. The author is not a flax farmer and did not grow up as such, but he is still baffled by how important flax used to be and how unimportant it is today. Nowadays, we find flax as carbonized fibers (although other sources of carbon fibers are more common) in airplane composite materials, but also United States Dollar bills. Sometimes expensive clothes are made of flax. Composites made of uncarbonated flax fibers are gaining momentum nowadays as a modern hype. These materials have excellent properties in vibrations and isolation and are also very fashionable.

To farmers, the most beautiful creation is a flowering flax orchard. The charming, beautiful purple color is even more beautiful than indigo blue. Indeed, the combination with the flax stem's light green, where the fibers are growing, is splendid. Each flower blooms only one day. There are, however, numerous flowers, making the entire transitory blossoming period around three weeks.

It all begins with preparing the ground and careful raking. Then, one must choose the perfect day to sow the seeds. The honor to do this goes to the head of the family. He acts, on that day, like a God. Prayers are not uncommon. Sowing is done with love and affection, hope and aspiration. Even the choice of seeds is very delicate. The Latin name for flax, exploited for its fibers, is Linum usitatissimum, which means 'the most useful type of flax.' Flax also exists to extract linseed oil, but our ancestors aimed for real gold: perfect fibers.

Growing flax takes 100 days from sowing until harvesting. Our ancestors probably experimented with growing flax on their land. However, the ground was usually used for other crops. Instead, flax was grown on somebody else's farm. Indeed, high-quality flax can be cultivated within 100 km from the coast, between Caen in France and Amsterdam in the Netherlands. The best soils are found in Northern France (Picardie). If he did not know the farmer, the standard procedure for a flax merchant was to lease land in France for one season 50/50 with the landowner, Compte ’a Demi. This means the merchant paid half the cost and earned half the gain. Such a procedure was widespread and allowed the farmer to merchandise his yield, diminishing the risk in case of a natural disaster. To the merchant, it guaranteed that he would get the harvest. The harvest was then shipped by train or boats to the Golden River area in West Flanders for further processing, typically controlled by the merchant. Sometimes, a merchant sold the harvest at the train station to other merchants.

44.6.2 Plowing, Harrowing and Sowing Flax (’Ploegen, ’Eggen’ or ’Rakelen’ and ’Zaaien’)

Plowing was crucial for achieving high-quality flax. It was done as deep as possible, preferably before winter. When deeply plowed earth freezes, it crumbles and ensures a deep layer of grainy earth through which water can quickly drain. The first requirement was to avoid diseases and reduce unwanted weeds in the flax yard.

As soon as the soil and weather proved suitable, the farmer began to prepare his land. It was plowed again and then leveled and crumbled. So the farmer first used the plow, then a zevenschaar to uproot developing weeds, and then a harrow to better crumble the soil. Consequently, he leveled the land to become as flat as possible, without clods and pits. He used a roll, as seen in Figure 44.93, but also mats, planks, or sometimes even his bare feet.

Sowing flax was a religious ritual. Linseed was sown on the prepared soil and then lightly covered so the seeds were buried no deeper than 2cm. The farmer required sufficient expertise and mastery to perform this task to perfection. Flax was not allowed to grow too close, but also not too much spread out. Therefore, the right amount of seed per hectare was of paramount importance. When one chose to grow very fine flax, intended for lacework, a framework of twigs was made above the field through which the flax could grow so that it was well held and protected against blowing over or falling over. This was very intensive work, partly determining the high cost of fine linen. The linseed, shown in Figure 44.93, was always blessed before it was sown. There was also a great deal of superstition among the people from which they believed they could predict whether a flax year would be prosperous. They never sowed on Good Friday in most places, while in Moorslede, they did sow on this day. They also tried to sow at the new moon. Flax was instilled early in the morning and calm weather. The sower was usually given exceptional nourishment for performing his sacred act.

The sowing apron was pure white out of respect for the linseed, hoping the flax would also be paler. The seed was often poured into the seed coat by a beautiful young girl, as in Figure 44.98 on page 775, after which the sower could begin his precision work. Before the sower threw his first throw of seed on the ground, he had to pray and make a sign of the cross on his chest. A sign of the cross was also placed on the ground with the feet to keep away all evil forces. The farmer threw the seeds, as shown in Figure 44.93, with the tips of the fingers and in wide arches around him. Flax nut was used with the full hand, as was done with wheat and grain, to avoid sowing too close and to show respect.

The sower did not look around but kept his head still and concentrated on the path to follow, strip by strip, the entire field very evenly. While walking, the sower always took equal steps. He also threw the seed relatively high in the air for even distribution on the ground and hoped for long flax fibers. After completing the task, the farmers stuck blessed palm branches into the ground at the field's four corners. Sometimes, sacred ashes were scattered over the domain.

After sowing, the orchard was carefully raked. The land was rolled again slightly in dry weather to cover the seed a little better and protect it from dehydration. A horse never did the task because they made too deep wells. Therefore, the entire sacred ritual was done barefoot and very carefully.

Depending on the weather and the ground, a flax cultivator had to choose a suitable date to sow Flax between March 15 and April 15. Sometimes, May was selected if an early period needed to be wetter, resulting in lower quality or lower yield flax. Early sowing (long vegetative period) was beneficial for the total crop yield. However, flax was sensitive to night frost up to about three days after emergence, after which the frost sensitivity decreased.

There was approximately 120 kg of linseed necessary for one hectare. Flax required good moisture-retaining soil with an undisturbed profile and good drainage. The yield potential was determined by unchecked primary root growth, a homogeneous emergence, and steady development of the flax plants.

The soil had to be well-drained and sunny, so flax naturally did not grow near the Leie River but in better areas, particularly in the North of France. The ground had to be flattened so the plants grew equally and were quickly processed afterward. A flat and well-crumbled seedbed (approx. 4 cm) on a moist substrate was obtained when preparing the seedbed. Processing flax was done in the Leie River or nearby because of the beneficial properties of this specific river water and the centuries-old expertise in the area. Sowing linseed early in the year is possible because flax grows well in cold temperatures.

Funny expressions existed to describe the quality and properties of land with flax. A beautiful one is 'the farmer's wife has helped to sow,' meaning it was not evenly spread. Indeed, sowing flax was exclusively done by men; therefore, women unfortunately never acquired the necessary experience and expertise, hence the expression.

44.6.3 Weeding the Field

Flax then grew, and while it did, the land had to be weeded, as in Figure 44.93, several times, or only once at the right time, to ensure only Flax grew, as, also, in Figure 44.93, and nothing else. The entire family and available workers were involved in this mandatory task, although workers primarily did the work.

The intensive work lasted several days and always commenced with a solemn prayer, a moment of deep reverence for the task at hand. The farmers and workers also bestowed many blessings during the weeding process, a gesture of respect and hope for a bountiful harvest. This practice served not only to ask for prosperity for the Flax but also to discourage excessive gossip and maintain a respectful atmosphere. Workers, known for their penchant for gossip, were reminded of the potential consequences of their words on the harvest. Unlike cotton fields, flax fields did not require irrigation.

44.6.4 The Bloom of Flax

Flax blooms in the second half of May or early June. It takes three to four days for the entire flax field to be colored, with each flower blooming for only a few hours. Each flower opens early in the morning and is completely open by ten o'clock. Around two or three o'clock in the afternoon, the flowers close again to wither by evening. Each flax plant has different branches, which means that it flowers for several days in total. In the past, flax flowers were always blue, but white varieties are equally disease-resistant. The blue color of flax flowers is the most beautiful azure in the world. In particular, the combination of the light green Flax with the sky-blue color of the flowers is truly heavenly. Flowering Flax is even more beautiful when the sun shines, and the wind creates an undulating back-and-forth dance of the flax orchard.

René Declercq wrote a poem about blooming flax:

'Het vlas staat in de blom,
Al groen en blauwig,
En 't windje vliegt er om,
Zoo vleiend flauwig.
De herels recht en flinks
Hun teert topjes,
En keeren rechts en links
Hun kleine kopkes.
Hoe zot en preusch ze zijn,
Elk met zijn vaantje,
Van hemelsblauw satijn
Op' t groene staantje!
Hier beet een bruine bie
En ginder, ginder
Vlug weg en were, zie
Een witte vlinder
En voort tot waar dat blauw
En groen in' t koren
Vol lokkend grijs en grauw
Verloopt, verloren.
Zoover als om end om
Het oog kan dragen
Het vlas staat in de blom
Te wiegewagen!'

44.6.5 'De Mei steken'

When the Declercqs searched for sound flax to purchase, they visited many farms. Flax was often bought while it was still developing in the field. After flax was sold, farmers no longer preferred to be disturbed by frequent merchant visits. Therefore, they placed a 'May' on their orchard to signal that it was no longer the subject of trade. As it was locally called, this 'May stabbing' or 'de Mei steken' was done by a stick topped with a ball of straw at the end. Without straw, the farmer used a leafy branch to serve this purpose.

It also occurred that a flax merchant bought a flax orchard at an earlier stage, sometimes even before it was sown.

The earlier a merchant purchased flax, the cheaper and, therefore, the more profitable it was. However, it was also riskier. Sometimes, flax was bought after it was harvested, which was safer but more expensive. The negotiations between flax traders and farmers were a unique dance, each party employing their own special techniques. When merchants journeyed to Normandy to purchase flax, negotiations often took place over a glass of Calvados, a traditional apple brandy. This shared drink was not just a social custom, but a strategic move, a hopeful gesture for a prosperous trade. And in the spirit of direct and immediate transactions, flax was always paid for in cash.

44.6.6 Harvesting after 100 days : 'Slijten'

Flax should not be dark green and not too thick. It should grow fast enough and fast enough. An orchard is like a child and must develop correctly and at the right pace, as in Figure 44.94. A farmer must neither too quickly claim victory nor become desperate too soon. As parents must bring support without force, farmers must let nature take care of their orchards with respect and patience. Parents often make a mistake when describing their young children by claiming success and geniality. Flax merchants know that this is a mistake. Only the final product matters, while the road to success consists of hard work and humility, not pretentious vanity and self-claimed genius and skillfulness.

Flax, like life, can be 'read' reasonably quickly. When gently laid down by the dew and then straightened by the sun, high-quality Flax can surrender to nature and fit into the context without losing sight of the ultimate goal. Flax that works against nature is generally of lower quality, a lesson that applies to humans as well. Genius is more than being smart; it is the ability to fit within society and to grow and thrive within its framework. The sensible person knows that society does not change by kicking it but adapting it from high within, i.e. inside out. An excellent flax farmer respects his crops, not himself. These lessons from Flax farming and merchants are not just about agriculture; they are about life.

When Flax had reached its entire length, i.e., 80cm to 120cm, typically in the second half of July, it was harvested by hand. Flax was not cut but pulled or plucked from the ground. The job was customarily done by workers and was called slijten in Flemish.

An essential factor in flax harvesting is determining ripeness; the degree of maturity of the Flax has a significant influence on the quality of the fiber and the seed. This responsibility is comparable to one of a teacher's tasks: grading students. Also, in parenting, the mother and father must gradually feel the children's growing independence and provide trust and transfer of decision-making when the time is right.

Flax is harvested, as in Figure 44.94, when it is yellow-ripe, that is, when the stem turns yellow, and the leaves have fallen off the lower half of the branch, while the seed begins to change from white to brown.

Flax harvested too early gives yields with a weaker, flaky fiber and seeds less suitable for sowing, a result comparable to youngsters who gain independence when their brains are still insufficiently mature. The fiber yield will be lower, and it will also ret longer. Flax harvested late, which was already barren on the land, gives a broader, lean, brittle fiber, similar to adults who wait too long to become independent human beings. The lesson here is clear: timing is everything. Just as in life, the right moment for action can make all the difference in the outcome.

Generally, the correct harvest time is earlier for the Flax fiber than for the linseeds. One must choose the golden mean. For humans, this frequently corresponds to becoming university students.

In the past, the harvest was immersed in the river to 'ret' and release the fibers. If well-planned, the process can also be done on the field, where rain and dawn deliver sufficient humidity. As with humans, the process is either induced or happens naturally.

Harvesting may seem like a trivial task, but it was, in fact, an artwork. Among the workers were 'left pullers' and 'right pullers.' One had to find a technique to ensure the roots were pulled out swiftly, and an adjustment of the pull direction was required, determined by the direction of the flax plant. The world is not ideal; therefore, Flax does not always grow vertically. Good pluckers could work left and right and adjust their technique according to the situation. The roots had to be aligned so that all the flax plants were well-ordered from the beginning to make further processing easier. There was also a difference between Dutch harvesters and Flemish harvesters. Indeed, the Dutch pulled 'handfuls' and placed them on the ground, while the Flemish placed them on their arm and removed earth by smashing the roots on their knees. Slijten of Flax was complicated and had to occur as equally as possible over the entire field to quickly pick up and process without nestling problems, discontinuity in packing thickness, and so on.

As in Figure 44.94, Hedges was used for drying Flax before processing. Forming fences usually started with a vertical plank against which, on both sides, bundles of Flax were placed. Afterward, the plank was removed and re-used to make another hedge. Times change, and the applications are different, whence the process has also evolved, as described in Figure 44.94.

44.6.7 Stacking

When the flax hedges were dry, they were moved to a particular spot on the field and stacked, as in Figure 44.94. This was called mijten. Very often, a sail covered the stack to keep the rain out.

44.6.8 Threshing ('Boten' or 'Dorsen')

Flax fibers are located in the outer part of the stem. Several processes are required to remove those fibers adequately, which we will describe later. Because the fibers are most important, the process consists of preserving the threads while discarding the stem's remains. Linseed oil is typically harvested in areas where fiber flax could be better quality. In Canada, for instance, farmers cultivated Flax, which was better for oil production. Such Flax had stems with branches and was not suitable for fiber extraction. In Flanders, seeds were only used for sowing flax in the new season if they were good quality. Daughters of farmers knew this very well and used their intelligence amply when seeking a husband. The workers broke the Flaxseed balls with a kind of hammer necessary to remove linseed, as in Figure 44.95, which was heavy work done by hand and later by machines.

After the retting process, the empty seed balls remained attached to the flax stem. These were then later removed, a step that was sometimes unnecessary if the retting process was done correctly. This sequence of steps in flax processing provides a clear understanding of the process.

44.6.9 Rippling ('Repelen')

Threshing leaves the empty seed balls on the plant. They had to be removed by a comb, as seen in Figure 44.95, constructed on a table through which workers pulled bunches of Flax, leaving behind the empty seed balls.

44.6.10 Retting (or 'Roten')

'Flax retting' or Vlasroten is meant to release the bonding between the flax stem's exterior fibers and the wood-like inner structure, enabled by dissolving pectin, a natural glue inside the branch. Immersion in water and starting a 'rotting' process called retting or roten dissolves pectin and disconnects the fibers. However, further processing is required to separate the fibers from the rest and obtain a hair-like final product, which can then be spun and woven. Illustrations are shown in Figures 44.96 and 44.97.

Caissons in which flax was stacked floated because flax naturally floats, as also illustrated in Figure 44.96. One can, indeed, not expect flax to ignore Archimedes' law. Indeed, flax is hollow and, therefore, has a low density. Even the fibers are hollow. Heavy stones were placed on the top to immerse the caissons sufficiently deep. Workers emptied the massive caissons bundle by the bundle. Illustrations are shown equally in Figure 44.96.

To delve deeper into the fascinating world of flax processing, we invite the reader to explore Chapter 45. This chapter focuses on the work of Michel Declercq, the son of Ernest Constant Declercq, and provides a comprehensive overview of the various stages and techniques involved in flax processing.

44.7 He was an Investor

Here, we show some relics of the past, which show that flax farmers could also be flax merchants and investors. The reason is that farmers needed more land to develop economically and had to add activities as merchants, provided they had a barn to store Flax. Other investments also substantially ensured their family's stability when the flax price oscillated.

We discovered some expired shares once owned by Ernest Constant Declercq, shown as historical curiosities in Figure 44.99.

44.8 Stewards of Virtue, Knowledge, Literature, and Christianity

Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn have always been deeply invested in education, religion, agriculture, and the flax trade. They particularly admired the village of Deerlijk, renowned for its pioneering educational figures, such as Pieter Jan Renier, and its rich cultural heritage, exemplified by the Verriest family and René Declercq.

Economically, Deerlijk was significant, primarily due to its textile industry, including linen manufacturing. The village's population comprised a healthy mix of workers, farmers, and entrepreneurs. Consequently, it is unsurprising that they invited many distinguished guests when Deerlijk celebrated the 'Bond van Grote en Jonge Gezinnen.' It is plausible that Ernest Constant Declercq dabbled in poetry, although no publications have been found to date. This chapter focuses on a notable event in 1933, highlighted by a remarkable photograph taken during a banquet.

The journal Derlike[14] published an article featuring a series of photographs by Gemma Defraeye and Nelly Verhelst. This article meticulously documented the 1933 event, marking the tenth anniversary of the 'Bond van Grote en Jonge Gezinnen,' Deerlijk division. The 'Bond der Kroostrijk Gezinnen' hosted a grand celebration in Deerlijk on August 26, 1933. The guest of honor was General Hector Deprez, and it appears that Baron Bekaert organized and sponsored the event. As was customary for such interwar period events, the ceremony began with the presentation of a new flag at the town hall at 9:00 AM.

This was followed by a procession to the church for a special service, a tribute to fallen soldiers, and finally, a banquet at the youth patronage (formerly located on Nieuwstraat).

At 3:30 PM, a large procession marched through the municipality. The 1999 article identified several key figures, which we supplement here. Identified attendees included General Deprez, the Bekaert family (father and son), and several prominent educators from Deerlijk and Zwevegem. We have identified a total of 50 individuals in the banquet photograph of Figure 44.102, including numerous writers. Notably, members of the Stijn Streuvels family (the Lateur and Gezelle families) are visible at the central table and in the background. The author was delighted to identify his great-grandfather Ernest Constant Declercq and Paul Lesage in the photograph. In the following section, we provide a comprehensive list of recognized individuals showcasing the diverse and influential attendees of the 1933 event.

Deerlijk has long been a hub of intellectual and cultural prominence. The significant contributions to the country and beyond by leading industrialists, the Renier and Verriest families, René Declercq, and others are noteworthy. The author believes a balanced mixture of intellectuals, industrialists, workers, and farmers fostered Deerlijk's cultural development. The presence of numerous immigrants, bringing diverse customs, traditions, and languages, contributed to an open-minded and wise community. Interactions among wise farmers, ambitious industrialists, and skilled artisans offered valuable learning experiences.

For example, around 1600, many French-speaking immigrants settled in Deerlijk, and later, industrial development and educational advancements attracted people from outside the municipality.

The interaction between different languages was poignantly expressed by British Queen Elizabeth in her 1992 speech to François Mitterrand: 'La tradition anglo-saxonne est un peu à la tradition latine en Europe ce que l'huile est au vinaigre : il faut les deux pour faire de la sauce, sinon, la salade est mal assaisonnée.'

The year 1933 was marked by significant global events, such as the appointment of Adolf Hitler as Reich Chancellor of Germany by President Hindenburg, the Reichstag fire, the establishment of the Dachau concentration camp, and the beginning of the boycott of Jewish shops. President Roosevelt announced his New Deal in the United States to revitalize the economy. Germany witnessed book burnings in May, while the Flemish National Song Festival took place in Antwerp on June 9. The Blankenberge Pier was inaugurated in early July, and on July 22, the Loch Ness monster was reportedly sighted. A week before the Deerlijk event, the Simele genocide occurred in Iraq. After the Deerlijk celebration, Joseph Goebbels mandated that all German artists join the Reichskulturkammer. On October 29, José Primo de Rivera founded the Falange Española in the Spanish Republic, leading to the Spanish Civil War three years later.

Notably, physicist Albert Einstein spent three months in De Haan (Le Coq Sur Mer) on the Belgian coast during the summer of 1933.

While some of this information appears in separate chapters of this book, readers interested solely in the 1933 event may find this chapter sufficient. The author has also submitted an article to the journal 'Derlike' of 'Heemkring Dorp en Toren' for comprehensive coverage, including facial recognition images and extensive references.

44.8.1 Ernest Constant Declercq

He is number 6 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947) was the author's great-grandfather and an occasional writer. While it is well-documented that he was an avid reader, the precise nature of his literary contributions—whether prose or poetry—remains to be determined.

Vroom aandenken aan den

Heer Hector-Cyrille DEPREZ

Echtgenoot van

Mevrouw Alida VUYLSTEKE

Luitenant-Generaal ter eere

Eereburger der gemeente Deerlijk

Hij werd geboren te Ingooigem den 9 November 1873, overleed te Gent den 15 Oktober 1939.
en werd begraven te Deerlijk den 19 Oktober.

Ik ben niet den vrede — het rustige gemak — komen brengen, maar wel het zwaard — en het leven leert ons telken dage weer, dat vrede alleen veroverd wordt door sterke menschen. Menschen die zich zelf kunnen overwinnen — het harde werk niet vluchten — het hoogere betrachten, — wilskrachtig!

De duurbare afgestorvene heeft daarvan een treffend voorbeeld nagelaten. De harde beproeving heeft hem niet moedeloos gemaakt, De rijke gaven waarmede zijn Schepper hem naar lichaam en ziel had begiftigd, heeft hij met taaie volharding weten te ontwikkelen, zoodat hij is geworden een man van roem en eer.

Groot is hij geworden en goed is hij gebleven, Hartelijk wist hij met den mindere om te gaan, en 't was hem eene voldoening zijn macht en aanzien te gebruiken om aan velen dienst te bewijzen.

Daarom zal zijne gedachtenis in eere blijven en durven wij te verhopen dat Hij, die beloofd heeft dat een glas water in zijnen naam gegeven, niet onbeloond zal blijven. thans ook zijn dienaar in groote bermhertigheid zal ontvangen. Omdat echter het oog dat God aanschouwt zoo vlekkeloos zuiver moet zijn, zoo zal onze dankbaarheid zich uiten in het nederig en vurig bidden voor de zielerust van den duurbaren afgestorvene.

Declercq's influence extended significantly to writers André Demedts and Gabrielle Demedts, the children of his close friend Maurits Demedts, as elaborated in Chapter 44.9 and Chapter 45.1.4.

Ideally, the transmission of knowledge and cultural heritage from one generation to the next occurs seamlessly. However, in the case of the author's ancestors, this continuity was disrupted by adverse circumstances such as the flax crisis, the premature death of the author's grandparents, and a lack of interest in historical preservation by the intervening generation. Despite these challenges, not all archival materials, including invaluable photographs, have been lost. The adage aptly captures this phenomenon, 'The blood creeps where it can't go.' The diligent efforts of the local historical society 'Dorp en Toren' have been instrumental in preserving and disseminating this heritage, as evidenced by their publication of hundreds of insightful articles. Image 44.102 is a particularly noteworthy example of their valuable work.

Direct and indirect sources had already shown that Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947) was friends with the Demedts family and also with Edward Vermeulen (1861-1934) and Emile Theophile Lesage (1857-1938). They are described in Chapter 44.8.2, Chapter 44.8.5, and Chapter 44.8.3. That these families were suddenly seen together in the same photo in Figure 44.102 was a hot sensation[15].

When Ernest Constant Declercq died in 1947, Gabriëlle Demedts (1909-2007) wrote a poem about her feelings, 'Ik heb gedaan ...,' shown on page 793, in which we can read that she admired him for what he had meant to her in her childhood. She lamented that he could no longer impart the wise words that had once flowed so freely from his lips. Despite the infirmities of age, which had stifled his laughter in his final days, the resolute strength of his character remained evident in the firmness of his handshake. Overwhelmed by the profound loss upon realizing he had passed, Gabriëlle was moved to tears. In the poignant conclusion of her poem, she subtly suggested that Ernest Constant, like herself, found solace and expression in the craft of poetry.

Gabriëlle Demedts (1909-2007) also wrote a poem about her best friend Valentine Declercq (1910-1939), daughter of Ernest Constant Declercq, when she became terminally ill shortly after her wedding. The poem is 'Zomer' and appeared in 'Dietsche Warande en Belfort' in 1939. It is shown in Chapter 44.5.5.

Given his extensive literary connections, it is highly plausible to surmise that Ernest Constant Declercq himself engaged in the creation of prose and poetry. Why else would Gabrielle Demedts have called him 'dezelfde' ('the same one') in her poem?

44.8.2 Edward Vermeulen and Elisa Vermeulen

They are numbers 9 and 40 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Aloise Edouard Vermeulen, born in Beselare on the homestead 'De Navingeer' on April 12, 1861, and died in Hooglede on July 6, 1934, soon after the event in Deerlijk, had a rich familial background. His mother was Marie-Thérèse Spruytte. His mother was Marie-Thérèse Spruytte, and his wife, Maria-Jacoba Nuitten, descended from a notable old family in Beselare, adding to the intrigue of his life.

Edward's father was Augustus Vermeulen, born in Beselare on July 26, 1829, the son of Petrus Josephus Vermeulen and Amelia Judith Drouillon. Petrus Josephus Vermeulen was born in Beselare on December 24, 1764, was a farmer, and married Amelia Judith Drouillon in Beselare on October 4, 1817.

Edward became especially famous under the pseudonym Warden Oom. He wrote reasonably dialectically about peasant life in West Flanders. He had roots in the Hooglede-Westrozebeke region, moved there with his parents in 1865, and went to school in Hooglede. Later, he was educated by Hugo Verriest[16] in the Klein Seminarie of Roeselare until 1877, when he was 16 years old.

He had occasionally already written poems when he endeavored his first novel, 'Herwording' in 1911. He was 50 years old but was well known in the Hooglede area, where he served as a congregation receiver and had frequently published in local papers. He wrote under the pseudonym Warden Oom in the magazine De Stem uit het Vaderland of the Flemish Seasonal Workers in Northern France and Wallonia. He also served as co-publisher of 't Manneke van de Mane. Hugo Verriest was full of praise for Edward Vermeulen when he received his poems in 1906 when Michel Declercq (DC15) was born. Prosaic work, 'Pole,' a 21-episode story, appeared in 1908 in the weekly 'De Wegwijzer.'

Edward Vermeulen (1861-1934) lived in Hooglede during WWI. Just like Ledegem, where Emile Theophile Lesage (1857-1938) lived with his son Paul Lesage (1902-1976) (described below in Chapter 44.8.3 and further in Chapter 64.7.8), the village was evacuated in the summer of 1917.

Edward Vermeulen stayed in Meulebeke for some time before continuing his journey to Mol. Although the main square of Meulebeke is only 8 km away from where Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947) lived, it is unlikely that Edward visited Wielsbeke. Otherwise, [15] In this work, we always used two software to identify persons based on biometric comparisons. The most spectacular one, in which one face blends into another, is 'Facefilm.' In Ernest Constant's case, we also found similarities with other family members and would have identified him even without software.

[16] The Verriest family is also found in Chapter 43.7 and Chapter 44.11.

he would probably have mentioned it in his book 'Dagboek van een banneling' in 1934.[17]

Yet Marie Elodie Devenyn (1876-1965), described in Chapter 44.3, the wife of Ernest Constant Declercq, had roots in Meulebeke through the Vereecke and De Bouvere families.

An encounter might have been possible because several villagers from Hooglede and Westrozebeke were passing through Meulebeke at that time, where Emile Lesage had roots. We believe that Emile Lesage, Edward Vermeulen, and Ernest Constant Declercq met in the summer of 1917. Indeed, Emile Theophile Lesage was a close acquaintance of Edward Vermeulen, and we know that the Lesages stayed in 1917 at the farm of Ernest Constant Declercq in Wielsbeke.

An interesting detail is that Edward Vermeulen was welcomed in Meulebeke by the headmaster, Van Hove. The Van Hove and De Bouvere families were related by marriage in Meulebeke in 1835. The Lesage and Declercq families must have heard that Edward Vermeulen stayed in Meulebeke in 1917, which nearly guarantees an encounter.

44.8.3 Paul Ireneus Lesage

Paulus Ireneus Lesage is described in detail in Chapter 64.7.8 and was born in Moorslede on June 19, 1902, in a house near the station. He died in Roeselare on September 1, 1976, and was a son of Emile Theophile Lesage (1857-1938) and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens (1868-1931). He was four years older than the author's grandmother, Irma Helena Lesage (1905-1953), his sister. Paul Lesage was married to Maria Magdalena Herpoelaert (1897-1967) and had a son, Gaston Lesage (1927-2017), who was six years old in 1933. Emile Theophile Lesage, described in detail in Chapter 64.6, was a son of Louis François Lesage from Langemark and Rosalie Dewanckele from Hooglede. DNA evidence is given in Chapter 73.8 on page 1590.

Since Michel Declercq (1906-1963) and Irma Helena Lesage (1905-1953), son and daughter of Ernest Constant Declercq and Emile Theophile Lesage, respectively, were married in 1932, we assume that the latter stayed with his daughter Irma and son-in-law Michel at the farm 'Hof van Brussel' in Wielsbeke, during the event in Deerlijk. Emile's wife, Eudoxie Romanie Lammens, described in Chapter 64, had died in 1931, so he was a recent widower. It would be logical that his son Paul brought him from 'Westhoek' to our region on the Leie that day.

The Lesage-Lammens family moved to a farm in Ledegem, Kortwagenstraat 33, in July 1912. Life was beautiful there until WWI began. The two eldest sons, Cyrille, described in Chapter 64.7.1, and Gerard, described in Chapter 64.7.5, were military and were drafted. Later, a younger son, Hector, described in Chapter 64.7.6, would also become a soldier. Cyrille Lesage (1890-1916) was a chasseur à pied (2nd company) buried at Père Lachaise in Paris. He received several awards, including 'Chevalier Ordre de Leopold II (April 20, 1917),' 'Croix de Guerre (April 20, 1917),' 'Yser Medaille' (Arrêté Royal 917.2, April 19, 1921).

We know less about the military life of Gerard (1897), except that he earned two front chevrons and was part of the mounted artillery or guides. After the war, Gerard married Magdalena Meersseman (1899-1976) and died at a relatively young age, childless, of pneumonia. He is said to have had fragile lungs from a gas attack during the war. His widow Magdalena later married the youngest brother, Daniel Abel Lesage (1911-1988), described in Chapter 64.7.12. After becoming a widower at an older age, Daniel moved to Deerlijk and died there on April 29, 1988.

Hector (1898-1918) signed up as a soldier near the end of the war and was killed in the final offensive on the same day and almost in the same place as Maurice Florimond Verhaeghe (1892-1918) described in Chapter 48.9.5.4. Hector Lesage is buried at the Belgian military cemetery of Houthulst. He was posthumously awarded the Victory Medal and the War Cross.

When the advancing Germans approached Ledegem in 1914, the Lesage-Lammens family decided to split. Emile Lesage remained with his son Paul Lesage, and the rest of the family fled to France. They eventually landed in Oudezeele, with the Secq family in Route des Trois Rois 77. Father and son had a relatively everyday life during the German occupation until Ledegem was confiscated for military supplies.

The German occupiers then told the inhabitants to leave. Similar events took place in other villages around the front. On July 23, 1917, Emile and Paul Lesage hastily left Ledegem, a statue of Mary, and some possessions quickly taken. They ended up in Wielsbeke with the Declercq-Devenyn family at the farm Hof van Brussel. The father of the family, Ernest Constant Declercq, is described above in Chapter 44.8.1.

It soon became apparent that both fathers and the family's children had a shared interest in literature. Ernest Constant's eldest son was Joseph (1902-1989), described in Chapter 44.5.1, and was the same age as Paul Lesage (1902-1976). The author's grandfather, the other brother, Michel Declercq (1906-1963), was four years younger.

Michel Declercq married Paul Lesage's youngest sister, Irma Helena Lesage (1905-1953), in the interbellum. Their story can be found in Chapter 45.

The family later moved to Deerlijk, first, as described in Chapter 45.5, not far from the Chapel Kapel-ter-Ruste[18].

In a farm near the station and, finally, in a house they built in the street 'Oude Heerwerg,' as outlined in Chapter 45.6.

Emile Lesage was born in Westrozebeke, his grandparents lived in Langemark and Hooglede, and he knew the Vermeulen family, of writer Edward Vermeulen, very well. It is curious that after the war, the Lesage-Lammens family would move, on September 30, 1921, to Beselare, the home village of Edward Vermeulen. Their farm was built at 'Spilstraat 12' on 'Keiberg,' at the intersection with 'Slangemeersstraat.'

Determining the further life of Paul Lesage was the fact that his arm was seriously injured during the bombing of Ledegem in early August 1916. The story goes that Paul was peeling potatoes when a shell hit the farm.

Most of the children in the Lesage-Lammens family were bilingual because, especially the girls, they had studied at a French-speaking school in Moorslede. Irma Lesage, for instance, wrote in Dutch but reasoned in French, as evidenced by the notes we found. Their stay in Northern France during WWI had, of course, further contributed to their French skills. Paul Lesage's mother, Eudoxie Romanie Lammens (1868-1931), stemmed from farmers and the military, outlined in Chapter 71. Her mother was Natalia Juliana Decaestecker and was the granddaughter of Pierre Joseph Decaestecker.

The latter was a soldier in Napoleon's army and fought in Austerlitz (1805), Ostrelenka (1807), Friedland (1807), Spain (1808-1813), Bayonne-Orthez-Toulouse (1813-1814) and Waterloo (1815). He was awarded the Saint Helena Medal in 1821. Eudoxie's uncle was Charles Lammens, a military officer. He was chasseur 'a pied together with Hendrik Conscience (1812-1883).

The Lammens family lived in the Vladslo region for several generations, where Joseph Leopold Lammens, born in Vladslo in 1790, married Anna Theresia Pareyn. The latter's ancestors arrived in the area of Woumen after they moved from Damme. They descended from the couple Joanna Francisca Ardan and Charles Caestecker. Joana was a descendant of Jean François Ardan and Marie Josephe Rouye, who defended Damme against the Dutch States.

The Lesage family were farmers with ancient Cambresis blood in their veins, as outlined in Chapter 65. They descended from the de Patin family, whose history dates back to the 1300s at the Cambrai Castle.

After living in the Menen-Geluwe area for several generations, the family moved to Ypres. Anyone visiting the town hall of Langemark may be told that this is the site of Langemark Castle, built by the viscounts de Patin de Langhemarck, described in Chapter 70. In particular, the Lesages and the Vermeersch family share the same ancestors as Viscount Charles Philippe de Patin, described in Chapter 70.6. To understand de Patin, one must return to the Austrian period.

He was born near Ypres on April 19, 1687. Since Ypres was French during his youth, he grew up as a Frenchman. However, he chose to study in the Austrian Netherlands at the Studium Generale Lovaniense (the Catholic University of Leuven). He became a lawyer and, thanks to his multilingualism and talent for diplomacy, was able to rise to the position of chief counselor to Charles VI, Holy Roman Emperor, and later to his daughter Empress Maria Theresa of Austria, and was concerned with the Austrian Netherlands (Belgium). When Charles Philippe de Patin worked as a negotiator for the Austrians during the conflict that arose with France through the Austrian succession (1740-1748), he prevented our country from being destroyed by the French and the Council of Flanders from being abolished.

When de Patin subsequently offered his resignation to the French king (H.M. Louis XV) from the Council of Flanders and expressed his desire to join his Empress in Austria, the king is said to have told 'he wished he had such loyal servants himself'.

Above all, De Patin has remained famous for his work Mare Liberum, described in Chapter 70.6.10 which has been published in three languages, shown in Figures 70.53 and 70.55 on page 1473. Grotius was, of course, ahead of him in writing such a manifesto, but this was not universal and, in fact, only protected the Dutch fleet. De Patin went much further in his argument and obtained that a country like Belgium (as part of the Austrian Empire) was also allowed to sail the world's seas. Just as with Grotius, the Dutch, and the Zeelanders could obtain their VOC; we acquired the Ostend Company (1722-1731), through which trade was temporarily conducted with India's East Coast. It is from the de Patin family that the Lesage family inherited their rather sturdy chin and jawbones.

44.8.4 Joseph Ziller

This person, described in Chapter 64.7.8.5, was a Frenchman from Lorraine and had started his career with the French police. Readers unfamiliar with the context would not understand why a French police officer was at the event in Deerlijk - he was not a spy. Joseph Ziller was married to Maria Lesage. He was born in Jarville, in the department of Meurthe et Moselle, in France, on June 9, 1889. He died in Oostnieuwkerke on May 4, 1939, and is buried in Westrozebeke.

During his career, he was a member of the French police. He became a disabled war veteran during WWI. He has received several decorations from the French army. He had no children.

His wife, Maria Lesage, was related to Paul Lesage's wife (nr 36). We also have a photo of Joseph Ziller, in Figure 64.166 on page

[18] The Kapel-ter-Ruste origins are described in Chapter 49

1270, with Paul Lesage and his brother Daniel Lesage, and Paul's wife and father-in-law Désiré Herpoelaert (1869-1946), in 1938 at the Antwerp Zoo.

44.8.5 Maurits Demedts

Maurits Ferdinand Demedts (1872-1943), described in Chapter 44.9, was married to Celesta Vandenhende (1878-1966). His picture is shown in Figure 44.111 on page 791. The couple were excellent friends with Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947) (number 6 in Figure 44.102) and Marie Elodie Devenyn (1876-1965).

Maurits is perhaps best known as the father of writer André Maurits Demedts (1906 - 1992), who was born on August 8, 1906, Wielsbeke- Sint-Baafs-Vijve, the year in which the second son of the Declercq-Devenyn family, namely Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (1906-1963), the author's grandfather, was also born.

Also well known is André Demedts' sister, the poet Gabrielle Maria Celesta Demedts (1909-2007), born in 1909, the same year as Valentine Declercq (1910-1939), a daughter of the Declercq-Devenyn family, described in Chapter 44.5.5.

The Demedts family lived on the Elsbos farm in Sint-Baafs-Vijve, within walking distance of the Hof van Brussel farm in Wielsbeke, where the Declercqs lived.

44.8.6 Georges Ista

He is number 27 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Georges Ista, a man of many talents, was born in Liège on November 12, 1874. His diverse skills and interests spanned across various fields. He was not only a Walloon writer and militant but also a screenwriter, draftsman, and painter. His versatility was a testament to his creative spirit and intellectual curiosity.

In Wallonia, especially in Liège, the man was well-known for his theatre work before WWI. He also organized, together with Maurice Wilmotte, the first Congrès de l'Association Internationale pour la Culture et l' Extension de la Langue française in 1905.

Many consider him a pioneer in the world of cartoons. In addition to his theatre work and talent as an artist, Ista was also known as a columnist in the Liège newspapers le Journal de Liège and L' Express.

He felt Wallonia had become too small for him in this capacity, so he went to Paris. There, he published numerous articles. He was in favor of everything that was French and everything that was Walloon. He regarded the French-speaking world as centralistic, with Paris in the center, against which regionalism had to counterbalance.

In 1917, he somehow returned from Paris to Belgium, but then he chose Paris forever. After WWI, he wrote many dramas, stories, comedies, operettas, chronicles, etc. We may assume that Ista came to Deerlijk thanks to Joseph Ziller (1889-1939), described in Chapter 44.8.4.

44.8.7 Willem Elsschot

He is number 34 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

1933 was the year in which Willem Elsschot published his famous work 'Kaas.' His real name was Alphonsus Josephus de Ridder, and he was born on May 7, 1882, in Antwerp. His father was a baker in the street Keyserlei. He died in Antwerp on May 31, 1960. He studied at the Royal Athenaeum of Antwerp and also at the Institut Supérieur de Commerce de l' État and is known as an atheist. One of his teachers at the Atheneum was Pol de Mont (1857-1931), a Flemish poet and writer. He chose the pseudonym Elsschot because, in his youth, he often went for a walk at Helschot between Blauberg and Veerle near Laakdal.

He has worked in many places, such as Antwerp, Brussels, Paris, Rotterdam and Schiedam. He worked in the latter municipality for the company Werf Gusto.

Elsschot began his career in Rotterdam, although he had previously published some experimental works in Flanders in 1900 and 1901 in Alvoorder. Today's reader is probably familiar with his work Villa des Roses, although it received little attention when published in 1913.

Later results were usually a hit, such as Lijmen in 1924, Kaas in 1933, Tsjip in 1934, and Het been in 1938.

Students who may read this book have probably heard of the student song Schele Vanderlinden, also written by Elsschot.

In the context of the event in Deerlijk, Willem Elsschot is said to have met Menno ter Braak and Jan Greshoff in 1933. The latter convinced him to return to writing, and the album Kaas was the result. This meeting would have taken place in 1933, according to the Willem Elsschot Genootschap[19].

In the photo taken in Deerlijk in 1933, we see both Willem Elsschot (nr 34) and Jan Greshoff (nr 44). The two may, of course, have met several times that year, but this photo proves that they met in Deerlijk. Isn't it amazing how Deerlijk, a tiny little village, most likely played a crucial role in Willem Elsschot's revival?

44.8.8 Karel Lateur

He is best known as the brother of Stijn Streuvels (1871-1969). Karel Lateur was born in Heule in 1873 and died in Bruges in 1949. Like his brother, he was the son of Camille Lateur and Louise Gezelle. He was a sculptor, trained in Matthias Zens' studio, and worked with Jules Lagae and Juliaan Dillens. He lived for a while in Guido Gezelle's birthplace in Bruges.

He mainly focused on religious art and made the mausoleum of Hugo Verriest, among other items. Although we do not know everyone's face, one can see from the features that at the middle table, besides Karel Lateur, there were also other family members of the Lateur and Gezelle clans.

44.8.9 Marcel Matthijs

He is number 37 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Marcel Gustaaf Matthijs was born in Oedelem on January 11, 1899, and died in Bruges on August 30, 1964. It is remarkable that he only attended primary school and then pursued many professions, such as cow warden, harness maker, and gardener, to eventually become a furniture upholsterer in his native village.

[19] Willem Elsschot Genootschap, website 2012-2013, based on 'Willem Elsschot, Letters, collected and explained by Vic van de Reijt with the cooperation of Lidewijde Paris, Em. Querido's Uitgeverij BV., Amsterdam 1993'

He left Flanders in 1919 to work in Wallonia and France. During that period, he even worked in coal mines for a while. He married in 1924 and from then on lived in Sint-Kruis-Bruges.

He wrote many novels but also ventured into poems and plays. One can deduce a sense of fatalism from his work. Unsurprisingly, he even became an anarchist.

The Spanish Republic’s existence, where many admired anarchism, will undoubtedly have inspired him. In 1933, during coffee in Deerlijk, he probably listened quite cynically to, presumably, the very Catholic speeches and discussions among the attendees, many of which were Christian, others socialist-atheist, liberal, or even a tad nationalist.

In the same year, Matthijs wrote his well-known work De ruitentikker, expressing his disappointment with the clerical ruling class, socialism, and social pressure. His personage breaks the windows in a village his work. May we hope it was not Deerlijk.

He could have entered a dispute in Deerlijk with August Defresne (nr 48), who was in Deerlijk with his mistress Anna Charlotte Ruys (nr 47).

Indeed, we know that the work Een spook op zolder, which Matthijs later published in 1938, was adopted by the then-wife of August Defresne (nr 48), namely Charlotte Köhler (1892-1977), into the play filomeentje.

On a political level, Matthijs was not an impeccable figure during the interbellum and WWII.

The reader can find more information in other literature.

44.8.10 Henriette Roland Holst

Henriette Goverdine Anna Roland Holst-van der Schalk, depicted as number 38 in the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780, was born in Noordwijk-Binnen in 1869 and passed away in Amsterdam in 1952. Renowned as a socialist and poet, Roland Holst studied French in Liège, contributing to her intellectual formation despite her Dutch heritage.

She married the visual artist Richard Roland Holst (1868-1939) and maintained close friendships with influential figures such as the poet Herman Gorter (1864-1927), who played a pivotal role in her conversion to socialism. Her artistic circle included notable personalities like Richard Roland Holst, Albert Verwey (1865-1937), Willem Kloos (1859-1938), and Jan Toorop (1858-1928).

In 1896, Henriette joined the Sociaal-Democratische Arbeiderspartij (SDAP), and by 1900, she was a delegate at the Socialist International. Her involvement in the international socialist movement was further exemplified by her participation in the Zimmerwald Conference in 1915, where she engaged with figures such as Leon Trotsky (1879-1940). The Russian Revolution had a profound impact on her, leading to her embrace of communism.

By the early 1930s, when the photograph in Deerlijk was taken, Roland Holst was actively writing socialist-themed poetry, plays, biographies, and journalistic articles. Her literary prowess brought her significant wealth and recognition. In 1934, her poetic work Tusschen tijd en eeuwigheid was published, reflecting themes that her 1933 visit to Deerlijk may have influenced. This is evidenced by statements on page 23 of the book, which suggest the potential impact of the Catholic community in Deerlijk on her thoughts.

Henriette Roland Holst’s contributions to literature and socialist thought were widely recognized. In 1934, she was awarded the Prize for Mastership for her entire oeuvre. In 1947, she received an honorary doctorate from the University of Amsterdam alongside Kamiel Huysmans (1871-1968), Pieter Nicolaas van Eyck (1887-1954), and Herman Teirlinck (1879-1967). She was also nominated for the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1939 and 1950.

1933 marked a significant period in her career when she met Ernest Constant Declercq. Declercq, a dedicated feminist, undoubtedly engaged in meaningful dialogue with Roland Holst and supported her endeavors. This meeting may have further inspired her work and reinforced her commitment to socialist ideals.

On page 23 of Tusschen tijd en eeuwigheid, she makes statements possibly influenced by Catholic Deerlijk:

’en met milde zekerheid gezegend, dat met elke beproeving, elke pijn, de harten dieper het besef doorregent, hoe allen toch in God geborgen zijn.’

On that same page, she gave additional advice, perhaps to herself, should she be able to turn back the clock:

’Maak van de driften van het lijf u vrij:
zij staan altijd gereed u te omsnoere’ en daarheen, waar ge zelf niet wilt gaan, te voeren:
ge moet meester zijn van uw lot: niet zij.’

And finally, she wrote a few words for students:

’de gave vrucht hangt het langst aan den tros’[20]

Her intense career had left traces in her sense of age[21]. So she wrote:

’Ik voel dat sterven naderkomt, en voel me nog zóó ver van u, God, zoo verstrikt in de dingen der wereld.
Spreek tot mij, opdat haar geruisch verstomt.
Leid mijn voeten, die nog aarzlen, tot de beemden, van uw dauw bepaereld.’

Finally, Deerlijk hopefully gave the ultimate decisive impetus for her to write the following[22]:

’Er valt opnieuw een nieuw licht op het leven
voor mij: ik ben nog niet aan ’t end:
ik moet weer ànders zoeken, verder streven:
de Meester heeft het blad voor mij gewend, en op ’t nieuwe staat een nieuw woord geschreven.’

[20] This may be a derivative of the very wise saying, based on life experience, that the erudite man said: ’Do not take revenge, the rotten fruits will fall by themselves’ .

[21] A sentiment shared by the author

[22] The author shares this sentiment and considers ending his book as the beginning of a new dawn.

44.8.11 Marnix Gijsen

He is number 39 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Marnix Gijsen was the pseudonym of Joannes Alphonsus Albertus Goris, and he was born in Antwerp in 1899. He died in Lubbeek in 1984. When the event in Deerlijk took place, Marnix Gijsen lived in his so-called 'First Belgian period 1899-1939.'

There would also be a 'Second Belgian period' from 1964 onward.

In between, he was in his American period when he stayed in New York. Marnix Gijsen was a Flemish Catholic and studied at the French-speaking Sint-Ignatius Institute in Antwerp and later at the predecessor of the current UFSIA.

Because he had demanded a Dutchification of the school, he was expelled in 1917. In that year, he argued, together with Paul van Ostayen (1896-1928), among others, against Cardinal Mercier (1851-1926), who was a Francophile. Finally, Marnix Gijsen obtained a PhD in history from the Catholic University of Leuven in 1925. He then studied at the University of Freiburg, the London School of Economics, and the Université de Paris. In his turbulent youth, he was a flemish political nationalist but later rejected this view. He still regarded himself as Flemish but no longer as a nationalist.

Important in the context of the event in Deerlijk is that Marnix Gijsen was a civil servant for Antwerp from 1928 until 1933, when he was appointed on January 1 by Frans Van Cauwelaert (1880-1961), who was then mayor of Antwerp, as director of the Fine Arts and Propaganda department. The year after the event in Deerlijk, he was promoted to chief of staff of Camille Huysmans (1871-1968) in the Ministry of Industry, Self-Employed and Domestic Trade. When Huysmans was replaced by Philip Van Isacker (1884-1951), Marnix Gijsen retained his position until 1938, after which he became Commissioner-General for Tourism. When Gijsen was in New York, connected with the Belgian pavilion at the world exhibition, WWII began and stayed.

He eventually remained in the United States until 1963. In 1947, Marnix Gijsen became an honorary citizen of New York.

Among various others, he received the Prijs voor Nederlandse Letteren in 1974.

When he came to Deerlijk in 1933, he had already written several well-known works. The previous year, he published Ons volkskarakter, een poging tot inzicht, which means that we may assume that his conversations in Deerlijk must have been rather contemplative.

44.8.12 Anton van Duinkerken

He is number 41 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

The real name of Anton van Duinkerken was Willem Jan Marie Anton Asselbergs or, as on his birth certificate, Wilhelmus Johannes Maria Antonius Asselbergs. His friends, however, knew him as Willem Asselbergs.

He was born in Bergen op Zoom on January 2, 1903, and died in Nijmegen on July 27, 1968.

He was a poet, literary historian, and professor.

He married Nini Arnolds (1903-1990) in 1930.

Above all, he was a Catholic writer and won several awards and recognitions.

It is remarkable that in 1933, the year of the banquet in Deerlijk, he won the C.W. van der Hoogtprijs for his work Dichters der contra-Reformatie. The prize had already been awarded to him in 1932, something one must have known in Deerlijk. In 1932 he published Katholiek verzet and in 1933 Welaan dan, beminde gelovigen.

Who knows, Deerlijk opened the eyes because, in 1934, he did not publish anything for a while, only to appear in 1935 with De menschen hebben hun gebreken.

The work Guido Gezelle 1830-1899 that he published in 1958 proves that our region must have left a deep impression. The meeting with relatives of Gezelle in Deerlijk will undoubtedly have played a role.

He could not capture it all in the latter work, whence, in 1960, he added the work Vlamingen to his oeuvre.

In 1937, four years after the event in Deerlijk, Asselbergs received an honorary doctorate from the Catholic University of Leuven. He became a professor at Leiden University in 1940.

44.8.13 Stijn Streuvels

He is number 43 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780. Stijn Streuvels is so famous that, as the saying goes, A bon vin point d'enseigne, we count on the reader's general knowledge for more information. However, to provide a more comprehensive understanding, we shall delve into this remarkable literary figure's life, works, and critical acclaim.

Stijn Streuvels, whose real name was Frank Lateur, was an eminent Flemish writer whose literary contributions have left an indelible mark on European literature. Born in Heule in 1871, Streuvels initially gained recognition in his local area as a baker. This profession provided him with profound insights into the daily lives of ordinary people, which would later influence his literary works. Over time, his stature grew, and he emerged as a towering figure in literature, earning widespread acclaim.

Streuvels was married to Alida Staelens (1879-1975), a partnership that supported his literary endeavors. His family background is notable; his parents were Camille Lateur (1841-1897) and Louise Gezelle (1834-1909). Louise was the sister of Guido Gezelle (1830-1899), a renowned poet and priest, which suggests a familial environment rich in literary and intellectual stimulation.

Streuvels' literary career was marked by prolific output and profound themes. His works often explored the complexities of rural life, the struggles and resilience of the common people, and the inexorable passage of time. His narrative style, characterized by vivid descriptions and deep psychological insight, resonated with a broad audience and earned him critical acclaim.

Notably, the Nobel Prize committee considered him for the Nobel Prize in Literature 15 times, a testament to his significant contribution to the literary world.

Among Streuvels' most celebrated works are De Vlaschaard (1907), Het leven en de dood in den ast (1926), and De teleurgang van de Waterhoek (1927). De Vlaschaard (The Flaxfield) is often hailed as his masterpiece, depicting the life and hardships of a rural farming community with poignant realism and empathy. The novel explores generational conflict and the harsh realities of rural life and showcases Streuvels' ability to blend social critique with deep humanism.

Het leven en de dood in den ast (Life and Death in the Barn) and De teleurgang van de Waterhoek (The Decline of the Waterhoek) further solidify his reputation as a master storyteller. These works are characterized by their meticulous attention to detail and their exploration of themes such as the passage of time, the inevitability of change, and the resilience of the human spirit. Streuvels' ability to capture the essence of rural life and his sympathetic portrayal of his characters have earned him praise from critics and readers alike.

In 1933, during a pivotal moment, Streuvels met our ancestor, Ernest Constant Declercq, an influential figure in his own right. This encounter occurred during a banquet, captured in the photograph where Streuvels is identified as number 43. The interaction between these two luminaries is a fascinating chapter in our family's history. Judith Declercq, Ernest Constant's daughter, and her sister Ernestine were also close with Stijn Streuvels. The author's grandmother, Anna Den Dauw, knew Steuvels personally, not in his writing capacity, but in his profession as a baker.

Critics speak warmly of Streuvels' works for several reasons. Firstly, his vivid and evocative prose brings to life the rural landscapes and communities he intimately knew. His ability to paint with words allows readers to fully immerse themselves in the settings and experiences of his characters. Secondly, Streuvels' deep empathy for his characters, particularly those from marginalized and rural backgrounds, gives his works a profound emotional depth. His characters are not mere stereotypes but fully realized individuals with complex emotions and motivations.

Furthermore, Streuvels' exploration of universal themes such as the passage of time, the struggle for survival, and the resilience of the human spirit resonates across cultures and eras. His works transcend their specific rural settings to speak to broader human experiences, making them timeless and universally relevant.

Stijn Streuvels' enduring legacy is reflected in his extensive body of work and his influence on subsequent generations of writers. His novels and short stories continue to be studied and celebrated for their literary merit and insightful portrayal of human nature. His life and works are further explored in Chapter 48.12.2.3, where readers can better understand his impact on literature and culture.

Streuvels passed away in Ingooigem in 1969, leaving behind a rich legacy that continues to inspire and captivate readers worldwide. His journey from a humble baker to a literary giant is a testament to his talent, perseverance, and the timeless power of storytelling.

44.8.14 Jan Greshoff

As mentioned in Chapter 44.8.7 about Willem Elsschot (1882-1960) (nr 34), this person was responsible after a meeting in 1933[23], for the revival of Elsschot. After this revival, the first work was the book Kaas, dedicated by Elsschot to Greshoff.

Jan Greshoff was a journalist and a writer. He was born in Nieuw-Helvoet on December 15, 1888, and died in Cape Town on March 19, 1971.

As a journalist, he worked for the paper Dagblad van Zuid-Holland and 's Gravenhage. He has also worked for De Telegraaf.

He wrote numerous poems. His first collection was Lumen, later he wrote Aardsch en Hemelsch in 1926 and Ikaros bekeerd in 1938. In 1933, he released Pro domo, the year before Voetzoekers, and in 1934 Arthur van Schendel.

As our photo shows, it is extraordinary that Jan Greshoff met Arthur van Schendel (nr 45) the year before, namely in 1933, in Deerlijk. The latter is described in Chapter 44.8.15.

44.8.15 Arthur van Schendel

He is number 45 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

It was precisely in 1933 that Arthur van Schendel won the Tollens Prize for his entire work. Two years earlier, he had already won the C. W. vander Hoogt Prize for 'Het fregatschip Johanna Maria.'

After WWII, in 1947, he would posthumously win the P.C. Win Hooft Prize for Het oude huis.

Arthur François Emile van Schendel was born in Batavia in the Dutch East Indies on March 5, 1874, and died on September 11, 1946.

He was a versatile Dutch writer of, among other items, the novels Een zwerver verliefd, De wereld een dansfeest, Het fregatschip Johanna Maria and Een Hollands drama.

44.8.16 Count Maurice Lippens

He is number 46 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Count Maurice Auguste Eugène Charles Marie Ghislain Lippens was born in Ghent on August 21, 1875, and died in Ixelles on July 12, 1956. He was a liberal politician and was also governor-general of the Belgian Congo.

He is the grandfather of the famous mayor of Knokke-Heist, Count Leopold Lippens (1941-2021).

He was a doctor of law and has held several important positions.

In the context of his visit to Deerlijk in 1933, it is essential to note that from 1932 to 1934, he was Minister of Public Education. The year after the event in Deerlijk, he became Minister of State. He received the personal title of 'Count' in 1936 after enrolling in the peerage in 1921.

44.8.17 Anna Charlotte Ruys

Born in Dedemsvaart, a town situated 20 km northeast of Zwolle, on December 21, 1898, Ruys' life journey is marked by resilience, intellect, and a commitment to scientific advancement. She passed away in Amsterdam on February 8, 1977.

Ruys received her early education at the Gymnasium in Zwolle. Despite the systemic barriers of her time, she demonstrated remarkable adaptability and determination, traits essential for her subsequent achievements. The Gymnasium in Zwolle has a storied history, tracing its origins to the Latin school that was well-known in the city during the 14th century, particularly under the rectorship of Johannes Cele (1350-1417).

Notable alumni of this institution include Johan Rudolph Thorbecke (1798-1872), a prominent Dutch statesman, and Pope Adrian VI (1459-1523). The school, once located on the Nieuwe Markt, a stone's throw from the notorious Walstraat, eventually moved outside the city walls due to its success.

Undeterred by the era's gender biases and the challenges faced by women in academia and professional fields, Ruys continued her studies in Utrecht before moving to Groningen, where she pursued a medical degree. Her graduation in 1925 was a significant milestone, and by 1940, she had become a professor by special appointment in bacteriology, epidemiology, and immunology at the University of Amsterdam. This was a remarkable accomplishment, a testament to her resilience and intellect.

In 1933, at the age of 35, Ruys found herself in Deerlijk, facing personal and societal challenges. The reason for her visit was romantic in nature; she was involved with August Defresne, who is number 48 in the banquet picture. Their relationship, which began in 1924, persisted despite societal and legal obstacles. It was not until 1937 that Defresne's legal wife sought a divorce, but even then, a marriage to Ruys was impeded by the General Civil Servants Regulations (ARAR) of January 19, 1934. This regulation mandated the immediate dismissal of a woman under 45 if she married, a clause that starkly highlighted the gender discrimination of the period.

[23] We may cautiously assume that it concerns the meeting in Deerlijk

Despite these challenges, Ruys and Defresne maintained their relationship, and following World War II, they were finally able to marry on June 22, 1945. However, the couple did not have children.

The presence of Edward Vermeulen's wife and Ruys's lover at the Deerlijk event suggests that Ernest Constant Declercq, number 6 in the banquet picture, conversed with Ruys. Declercq, a principled man whose daughters were distinguished students, must have highly regarded Ruys for her academic and professional achievements.

Anna Charlotte Ruys was indeed a remarkable woman. Her dedication to her field and her ability to overcome significant personal and professional hurdles serve as an inspiration. Her career in bacteriology, epidemiology, and immunology during a time when women faced considerable discrimination in the workforce is a testament to her strength and intellect. Ruys's story is of perseverance and excellence, deserving admiration and respect. Hats off to this extraordinary lady from Zwolle!

44.8.18 August Defresne

It's essential also to read the life story of Anna Charlotte Ruys (nr 47) in Chapter 44.8.17.

It is remarkable that in 1933, Defresne wrote the story De vrome speelman, about a playmate who leaves earthly life, women, and pubs behind and devotes himself entirely to God and Our Lady. Deerlijk must have made a deep impression on the man. Defresne will most likely have been a valuable asset to the others in Deerlijk.

Like Sigmund Freud (1856-1939) before him, he linked mythical stories with psychology. His debut in 1920 was The psychology of Van den Vos Reynaerde[24]. Indeed, the essence of a Middle Dutch epic to the Low Countries is similar to what Greek mythology meant to the ancient Greeks. Whether the story that Reynaert became fond of chickens after tasting one sparked any curiosity when August Defresne (nr 48) and Anna Charlotte Ruys (nr 47) first met in 1925 will probably never be known. Renaert's story may have influenced his first wife, Charlotte Köhler (1892-1977), and this can be inferred from the fact that they married in 1920, the year of his debut. Many attendees at the 1933 feast must have been impressed by a psychological approach to poetry and prose. An interdisciplinary approach is much more satisfying than the narrow scope of the specialist. The author can only hope that in 1933, Defresne (nr 48) also had a good discussion with his great-grandfather Ernest Constant Declercq (nr 6).

Marie André Antoine August Defresne was born in Maastricht on November 6, 1893. He died in Amsterdam on April 2, 1961.

He is best known and remains known as a playwright and director. His love for mythology and psychology has never ceased. Therefore, around 1950, when he was co-director of the Amsterdamse Toneelgezelschap, he directed works by Shakespeare.

The surrealistic character of his short stories must have caused some connection with Belgium, but his Limburg origins almost certainly contributed as well.

44.8.19 Pierre Henri Ritter

He is number 49 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780. Pierre Henri Ritter published under the pseudonym dr. P. H. Ritter Jr. and was born in Utrecht on August 16, 1882. He died in Amsterdam on April 13, 1962. He was a civil servant, Dutch literary scientist, writer, journalist, critic, and radio presenter.

In 1933, Ritter was editor-in-chief of the Utrechtsch Dagblad. We can, therefore, somewhat expect that he must have mentioned the beautiful event in Deerlijk in that newspaper unless Ritter regarded it as a 'business meeting' and not so much as a public event. He became a fierce opponent of National Socialism in the 1930s and, for that reason, ended up in Buchenwald during WWII.

Ritter was discovered as a writer by Lodewijk van Deyssel (1864-1952), who included the work of the then-young gymnasium student in his magazine De XXe Eeuw.

44.8.20 Baron Leon Leander Bekaert

We also refer to Chapter 42 and Chapter 43 for some documents in our archives related to the Bekaert family and to Chapter 44.10. He is well known in Zwevegem and the surrounding area and, therefore, needs little explanation.

Still, we will highlight some additional facts in the context of the 1933 photo. Leon Leander Bekaert was born in Zwevegem on January 28, 1855. He died three years after the event in Deerlijk. His father was Leander Leonard Bekaert (1797-1868). He was friends with Pierre François Devenyn, described in Chapter 44.3.3, born in Wortegem on October 14, 1789, and residing in Zwevegem, who married Sophie Derijcke in Otegem on May 12, 1824. From this marriage, Leopold Devenyn was born in 1832, with ancestors in Zwevegem, Otegem, Wortegem, and Anzegem.

Leopold Devenyn (1832-1895) had, with Ursula Vereecke (1836 –1910), only one child, namely Marie Elodie Devenyn (1876-1965), the wife of Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) (nr 6) (1872-1947). They married in 1901 in Wielsbeke, described in Chapter 44.4.

Leander Leonard Bekaert (1797-1868), friends with Marie Elodie's grandfather, died when Leon Leander Bekaert (1855-1936) (nr 1) was only 13 years old. In summary, Marie Elodie (1876-1965) knew the Bekaert family very well, as her father and Leon Leander Bekaert (1855-1936) were both the sons of friends Leander Leonard Bekaert (1797-1868) and Pierre François Devenyn (1789-1865).

Ernest Constant Declercq (nr 6) was not only the husband of Marie Elodie (1876-1965) but also a son of Ivo Declercq (DC13) (1845-1909) and Mathilde Van den Broucke (1848), described in Chapter 43. Ivo was a son of Leo Bernard Declercq (1808-1876) and Thérèse Loncke (1797-1868), daughter of Jean François Loncke (1711) and Marie Magdalena Desplenter (1754-1812). Jean François' parents came from Hulste, and he was born in Wielsbeke in 1711. He came from the Loncke-Vandekerckhove-Lambrecht clan. The Loncke family were farmers and millers in Hulste.

Isabella Rosa Loncke (1798-1878) was a daughter of Joannes Franciscus Clement Loncke (1765-1824) from Hulste and Isabelle Rose Vandekerckhove (1775-1820), and she married Charles Louis Masureel (1796-1877). Julia Sophia Masureel (1828-1895) was born to the couple, who married Rufin Romain Masureel (1829-1894), mayor of Bavikhove. From this marriage stem Marie Helene Romanie Julie Valerie Masureel (1856-1938), who married in Bavikhove, on July 24, 1888, to Leon Leander Bekaert (1855-1936) (nr 1). The chances are that Leopold Devenyn (1832-1895) had some involvement, as he had known the groom's father well and because he, through his son-in-law Ernest Constant Declercq (nr 6), also knew the bride.

We know that Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947) was an acquaintance of the Bekaert family in Zwevegem. Therefore, it is not surprising that he was one of the liaisons in the network of guests at the event in Deerlijk in 1933. We also know that one of Ernest Constant's daughters (nr 6), namely Judith Declercq (1918-2007), described in Chapter 44.5.8, was a frequent visitor to the family Leon Antoine Bekaert (1891-1961) & Elisabeth Velge (1894-1972). Her role as head of the organization 'Child Welfare' probably also fitted smoothly into the Catholic political world where the Bekaert family had since established itself.

It is also not surprising that Michel Declercq (1906-1963), son of Ernest Constant (1872-1947), described in Chapter 45 and the grandfather of the author (1975), took refuge in Leon Antoine Bekaert (1891-1961) after having been affected very hard in his role as a flax merchant, during the crisis of the 1930s and then through WWII. A friend in need is a friend indeed. Out of gratitude, the author gave his last son the name Leander as a middle name in 2011.

The interest in fellow authors must have awakened in Leon Leander Bekaert (1855-1936) when he wrote and published a book in 1927, 'The History of the Municipality of Sweveghem.'

Ernest Constant Declercq (1872-1947), farmer, flax merchant, occasional writer, and passionate reader, will have opened particular doors for him to which someone like Leon Defraeye might not have had access.

The links with Edward Vermeulen and the Lesage family have already been described above. Ernest Constant, a flax merchant, often ended up in France and the Netherlands. Thanks to him, the event's organization has contacted some Dutch people.

Leon Leander Baron Bekaert (1855-1936) is, of course, world-famous as the founder of the metal company Bekaert in Zwevegem, which developed into a world empire very soon.

44.8.21 Baron Leon Antoine Bekaert

He is number 2 on the 1933 banquet picture in Figure 44.102 on page 780.

Leon Antoine Bekaert (1891-1961) succeeded his father as director of the company and a baron. He married Elisabeth Velge (1894-1972). We mentioned the couple in the previous section. Their charming son Baron Antoine Bekaert (1930-1990) has become famous worldwide for his qualities as a person and manager of the global enterprise Bekaert NV.

44.8.22 Other persons and some concluding remarks about the banquet picture of 1933

At first glance, the photo may seem to witness an ordinary fait-divers following a party in little Deerlijk. A more in-depth investigation revealed that the coffee table was more like a Solvay Congress about everything Deerlijk loved at the time, namely the Church, literature, education, and industry. We may assume that what has been described here is only the tip of the iceberg. Most likely, more prominent figures can be identified, and perhaps one day, one can fully understand the importance of this meeting. We can proudly state that little Deerlijk was the center of the universe for a short while on August 16, 1933.

We can add a few remarks concerning the other persons present at the banquet of 1933.

Priest Joseph Coussement (nr 14) died in 1933. He is well known for his diary, which he wrote during WWI.

Camille Ryckebosch (nr 19) was the school principal in Zwevegem since 1916. He lived in Zwevegem since 1901 and originated from Beselare, from the Ryckebosch family who owned the pub Gareelmakerij in Beselarestraat, acquainted with Emile Theophile Lesage, whose daughter Irma Lesage married Ernest Constant's son Michel Declercq in Beselare in 1932.

Philip Monbaliu (nr 10) would later save the life of Maurice Declercq, grandson of Ernest Constant (nr 6), in 1961, after a motorcycle accident as described in Chapter 46.2.6.

Leon Defraeye (nr 25) established Heemkring Dorp en Toren, had been a classmate and friend of the author's great-grandfather Gerard Vangheluwe, described in Chapter 69.9, and is the founder of the archives in Deerlijk.

Edmond Vanneste (nr 31) was mayor of Deerlijk just after WWII. Gustaaf Steelandt (nr 28) was mayor of Deerlijk at the end of WWII.

René Vandekerckhove (1883-1968) (nr 24) was a teacher and music composer and is the great-grandfather of Reinhild Vandekerckhove (1969), who is known for her academic study of the dialect of Deerlijk.

Joseph Devos (nr 4) was not only a notary but also mayor of Deerlijk from 1939 until early 1944.

44.9 Friendship with the Family of André and Gabrielle Demedts

The reader may be interested in checking out Chapter 44.8.5 first, and further also Chapter 45.1.4.

André Maurits Demedts (Wielsbeke - Sint-Baafs-Vijve August 8, 1906 - Oudenaarde November 4, 1992) was a Flemish writer. He and his sister Gabrielle were friends of the Declercqs during their youth.

The two families knew each other for several reasons. First, their farms were within walking distance from each other, as shown in Figure 44.110. Second, they were both farmers. Third, both families enjoyed reading and culture, which was personified by Hugo Verriest, from Deerlijk, a priest in the area where the two families lived. Maurice, the author's father, probably even received his first name, inspired by Maurits Demedts, father of André, shown in Figures 44.111 and 44.113. The author's eldest uncle was named André. Indeed, Michel Declercq (DC15) was a good friend of André Demedts, hence the inspiration.

André Demedts had a much younger brother, 'Michel,' born in 1922 when the author's grandfather Michel (DC15) and André were 16. Michel Declercq's sister, Rachelle, born in 1912, carried Gabrielle as the second name. André Demedts had a sister, Gabrielle

Dirk en Jeanine Demedts-Hauben en kinderen,
Jo en Hilde Devoldere-Demedts en kinderen,

De families Demedts-Vandenhende en Ide-De Maré.

Sedert ik tot het bewustzijn van mijn doen en laten gekomen ben, heb ik getracht trouw te zijn, in de mate van de mogelijkheden die mij geschonken werden.

Ik heb getracht met onverstoorbare gelijkmoedigheid trouw te zijn aan mijn vrienden, hen vragend mij te aanvaarden en te beoordelen op mijn goede wil.

Ik heb getracht trouw te zijn jegens de geringen en beproefden, omdat ik weet wat zij meer dan anderen moeten torsen, met het verlangen dat mijn sociale gezindheid hen niet zou vernederen en anderen niet verbitteren.

Ik heb getracht trouw te zijn aan mijn volk, omdat het onze aarde en onze geschiedenis is die mij geboetseerd heeft en onze hoop mij tenslotte glimlachend doen vertrouwen heeft op een toekomst die ik misschien niet meer zal zien en toch in de lucht aanwezig voel als de lente die komt.

Ik heb tenslotte getracht trouw te blijven aan de christelijke overtuiging van mijn geslacht en mijn kinderjaren, beseffend dat ik de blijde boodschap van het christendom, dat rechtvaardigheid en liefde belooft, niet kan vervullen en onwaardig ben maar pogend het te doen in open eerlijkheid zowel jegens hen die mij hierin niet kunnen bijtreden als jegens mijn geloofsgenoten.

Maria Celesta, who died early. In 1909, his new sister was born, who received the same name as Gabrielle Maria Celesta Demedts, shown in Figure 44.111.

The grandfather of André Demedts, through his mother, was Modest Vandenhende, in Figure 44.114, husband of Rosalie Baert, in Figure 44.111. Modest was also the name of the brother of Ernest Constant Declercq.

When Ernest Constant Declercq died in 1947, Gabriëlle Demedts wrote a poem about her feelings. From the text Ik heb gedaan...(shown below[25]), we can extract that she admired him because of what he had meant to her as a child. She was sad that he could no longer speak the wise words he used to say. Even though his aged teeth stopped him from laughing at the end of his life, his firm handshake still exposed his inner strength. Realizing that he was dead, Gabriëlle broke into tears.

Ik heb gedaan...

Ik heb gedaan of al was als voorheen maar binnenin was de bevreemding groot.
Hoe kon het zijn dat jij nu minder scheen of was in werklijkheid de grootheid dood die in mijn ziel met jou was opgegroeid?

En waarom vlekte donker nu de mond
- de tover van je glimlach uitgebloeid - omdat de tijd je gave tanden schond?

Ik schaam mij diep. Ging ooit die sterke macht met deze broze dingen saâm? Ach neen en duizendmaal neen! Zwart als de nacht had jij mogen zijn, doof en kaal meteen als maar dezelfde uit je handdruk sprak...

Wie was dezelfde? Bestond die niet meer?
Ik zocht nog te schuilen onder het dak van zacht herinn' ren, maar 't stortt' op me neer

The reader will find the obituary card of André Demedts in Figure 44.112 and Anna Van Nieuwkerke in Figure 44.115. To get an impression of how a farm, such as the 'Hof van Brussel' farm of the Declercqs looked like, we show pictures of that of Demedts in Figure 44.116, which were kindly shared by Bert De Smet[26].

44.10 The Bekaert Family

The reader may find Chapter 44.8.20 exciting in this context, and also Chapter 42 and Chapter 43.

Here, we share souvenirs in Figure 44.117 of the Bekaert family that are not shown in Chapter 45.1.6.

Michel and Judith's acquaintances in Zwevegem and those of Ernest Constant were equal so that one may check there. Judith visited the family often as President of the Children's Welfare Organization, as described in Chapter 44.5.8.2.

Indeed, just after WWII, this organization played an important role because of the baby boom. Leon Bekaert is also described in Chapter 44.8.20 and shown in Figure 44.107 on page 782.

44.11 The Influence of Hugo Verriest

The Verriest family of Deerlijk, described in Chapter 42.8, were acquaintances of the Declercqs in Wielsbeke. They knew each other through the flax industry and probably even from earlier times.

Hugo Nestor Verriest (Deerlijk 1840 - Ingooigem 1922), shown in Figures 44.118, 44.119, 44.120, was a Flemish Priest, writer and philosopher.

He was a son of Petrus Johannes Verriest (Sint Lodewijk or Saint Louis, in Deerlijk).

[26] Bert De Smet is a driving force behind 'André Demedtshuis vzw' , and is engaged in education, the preservation of the local history of Sint Baafs Vijve and the legacy of the celebrated writer André Demedts and poet Gabriëlle Demedts.

Verriest received his early education from Pieter Jan Renier, described in Chapter 42.7, and later studied under the renowned poet Guido Gezelle at the Kleinseminarie in Roeselare. In 1864, he was ordained as a priest.

His career was unrolled in the following locations: Deerlijk, Roeselare, Brugge, Heule, Ypres, Wakken (near Wielsbeke), and Ingooigem. Albrecht Rodenbach (Roeselare), Constant Lievens (Moorslede, described in Chapter 64.7.12.12) and Edward Vermeulen (Beselare, described in Chapter 44.8.2 and Chapter 64.6.4.1) have been his students.

His teaching career included positions at educational institutions such as Sint-Lodewijkscollege in Bruges and Kleinseminarie in Roeselare, where he mentored prominent students like Albrecht Rodenbach and Constant Lievens. He also held positions as a rector, principal, and pastor at various locations.

Verriest was a key influencer in the Blauwvoeterij movement and significantly influenced the literary and cultural landscape. His staunch advocacy for the Dutch language in education and his editorial role in publications such as De Vlaamsche Vlagge and De Nieuwe Tijd highlight his influence on language, religion, and social issues.

In recognition of his contributions, Verriest became a member of the Royal Flemish Academy for Language and Literature in 1906. Additionally, he received an honorary doctorate from the Catholic University of Leuven.

Despite facing challenges from his Catholic superiors for his involvement in the Flemish Movement, Verriest's impact transcended political and religious boundaries. His literary works, including biographies and treatises on art and culture, as well as his romantic-impressionist poems, were widely acclaimed.

Hugo Verriest passed away in 1922 in Ingooigem and was laid to rest at St. Anthony's Church next to his friend Stijn Streuvels.

In Wielsbeke (the place of birth of Michel A. R. Declercq) as well as Beselare (the place where Irma H. Lesage lived before she married) and Moorslede (the place of birth of Irma H. Lesage), Hugo Verriest had left a cultural legacy and was extremely popular. It may have played a role in the decision of Michel A. R. Declercq and Irma H. Lesage to settle and construct a home after WWII in Sint Lodewijk Deerlijk, where we find the roots of Hugo Verriest.

While Hugo Verriest was a priest at Wakken, the Declercqs knew him very well. This was likely through the Demedts family, who had long had connections with Wakken (church and education). The Declercq family were not Flemish nationalists, but they enjoyed the Flemish culture and, in fact, culture in general.

The work of Hugo Verriest and those he had inspired was very well known to them. Persons like Constant Lievens joined the Jesuits, inspired by Hugo Verriest; Ernest Constant Declercq equally sent his sons to a Jesuit College for their Higher Education in Ghent.

The contact with Hugo Verriest must also have fed the admiration for Guido Gezelle (Brugge 1830 - 1899), uncle of Stijn Streuvels (Frank Lateur, described in Chapter 44.5.7.2, Chapter 44.8.13, Chapter 48.9.5.4.5, Chapter 48.12.1.4, and Chapter 48.12.2.3). Guido Gezelle, in Figures 44.124 and 44.126, had been a priest in several places such as Roeselare (1854-1860), Bruges (1860-1872) and Kortrijk (1872-1899).

Souvenirs of the Verriest family are shown in Figures 44.121, 44.122, 44.123, 44.124, 44.125 and 44.126.

44.12 The family of Van der Bruggen & de Nieulant et de Pottelsberghe

The Declercqs have been in contact with this family since the generation of Ivo Declercq, in Chapter 43.6 and Chapter 43.9. Some memorabilia are shown in Figures 44.127, 44.128 and 44.129.

44.13 The De Clerck & Lauwers Family

After WWII, this family of catholic farmers at Wielsbeke would establish and be associated with Beaulieu International Group through Roger De Clerck and Noël Demeulenaere. They have also served in the local catholic political party. Although both families

ECHTGENOOT VAN VROUW LEONIE BOONEN ;

Advocaat, Schepen van Kortrijk, Bijrechter ten Gehoore, Kerkraad van St-Maartens, Voorzitter van 't Davidsfonds aldaar, die, geboren te Deerlyk, op den 15sten Augusti 1830, godvruchtiglijk overleed te Kortrijk, op den 21sten Junij 1891.

— R. I. P. —

Hij was een van dezen die 't geweld der eeuwe durven weêrstand bieden, sterk en onwankelbaar zijnde in zijn Geloove.

Als Vader, als Echtgenoot en als Vriend was hij een voorbeeld van trouwe liefde en vaste toegenegenheid.

Hij vereerde in God de eeuwige Waarheid, de eeuwige Goedheid, de eeuwige Schoonheid ; en onder de menschen was hij gelukkig, wanneer hij het ware, het goede en het schoone kon handhaven, voorstaan en verdedigen.

Hij en verachtte niemand, zelfs den plichtige niet; maar, mensch zijnde, wist hij al dat menschelijk is te dulden en te verschoonen.

Wat gaf hem de pracht, de heerschappij, de rijkdom van de wereld, als hij hooger keek en God aanzag ?

Heere, wij bidden U, geeft hem die ruste, dien vrede en dat licht, die, ongestadig bij de menschen, bij U eeuwig zijn !

Kinderen, Vrienden, blijft hem weerdig, wiens tegenwoordigheid gij voor eenen tijd missen moet, maar wiens eere en deugd u, als een kostbaar en onvergankelijk erfdeel, blijven zullen.

Heilige Maria, Moeder Gods, bidt voor ons, arme zondaars, nu en in de ure onzer dood ! Amen.

are not blood-related, they were acquainted during the life of Ernest Constant and likely even earlier.

We are not aware of any contacts after WWII. The families were both flax cultivators and flax merchants. Around 1960, this family switched to industrialized manufacturing of carpets, a fact for which they are still very famous.

The author appreciates Noël Demeulenaere (1938) for some wise advice he offered him a decade ago. He also remembers that Noël, an amiable man, offered the author a cup of coffee and a biscuit at his home and consequently made fun of professors by stating, in German, Professoren haben viele Titel, aber keine Mittel.

Indeed, the world of multi-national industrialists is somewhat different from that of academics, but in the end, we take nothing with us but lasting memories, and why not 'titles'?

The author is relished that he joined the inauguration, by Noël Demeulenaere, of a statue de Vlasser in Wielsbeke to honor the flax farmers, merchants, and workers in the area in 1988. The statue is shown in Figure 45.22 on page 811.

44.14 The family Lambrecht Family

Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) and later his son Michel Declercq (DC15) often bought flax with Jozef Lambrecht from Wielsbeke - Sint-Baafs-Vijve.

Jozef was a son of Henri Lambrecht (from Wielsbeke) and Marie Lauwers (from Aarsele, in Figure 44.132).

44.15 The Van den Broucke Family

The mother of Ernest Constant was Mathilde Van den Broucke. The two families had close contacts, private and business, particularly with Jules Van de Broucke and later, until Michel Declercq died, with his son Jozef, who was married to Claire Lambrecht.

In particular, Jozef van den Broucke was known worldwide for his first-class race pigeons. Until the 1960s, most people owned race pigeons, and so did Michel Declercq (DC15) (the author's grandfather), Gerard Vangheluwe (the author's great-grandfather), and the author himself. Between 14 and 18, the author raced Barcelona, Brive, Limoges, Pau, Narbonne and Marseille. He first raced under his foster father's name, Pierre Vangheluwe, and later under his own.

Training a team of pigeons became a hobby when summer vacations were temporarily suspended due to his foster father's illness, Pierre Vangheluwe. In this context, the author became acquainted with Jozef Van den Broucke and others such as Roger Vereecke, Dirk De Ceukelier (husband of Hilde Deprez), Uwe Hermes, and Simon Callens from Deerlijk. Jozef Van de Broucke and Roger Vereecke are still celebrated as the crème de la crème in Japan and China.

In particular, the experiences obtained thanks to Simon Callens from Deerlijk, who died in 2024, are always hugely appreciated.

Although the author has been out of the pigeon business, he still has the skills to start again if needed. A busy international life, however, makes such a dream unrealizable. Being the coach of a team of pigeons is similar to being an educator. One must judge pretty, try to get the best out of every team member and stimulate growth.

Some souvenirs are shown in Figures 44.133 and 44.134.

Gelukkig deze die altijd de uur van hunne dood voor oogen hebben, en die alle dagen zich gereed maken om te sterven; want de dood is noch onvoorzien, noch te vreezen voor deze die dikwijls denken dat zij moeten sterven, en dat niemand noch den dag noch de uur kent. NAV. CHR. MATT. JOB.

De christelijke deugd was hare kleeding en de gerechtigheid diende haar tot eermantel en hoofdsieraad. Al hare jaren heeft zij doorgebracht in eer, weerdig van de algemeene achting en de liefde van hare familie en van al die haar kenden. Met veel zorg heeft zij gewaakt over haar huisgezin.

Zij was eene ware christelijke vrouw, eene goede moeder, en de liefde die zij hare kinderen toedroeg sloot deze niet uit die zij God verschuldigd was.

Jesus woorden indachtig : «Zalig zijn de bermhertigen, want zij zullen bermhertigheid verwerven» gaf zij vele, gaf zij geern, eene ware moeder der armen en bedrukten.
JOB, H. FRANC. DE SAL., H. GREG., MATT.

Hare kinderen zijn opgestaan om haar te loven en in 't oordeel Gods zullen die deugden als de schoonste paarlen harer kroon schitteren. PROV.

Vaartwel! Teerbeminde Kinders en Kleinkinders. Ik verlaat u, maar mijne liefde voor u zal blijven. Blijft God en zijne Kerk getrouw, en maakt uwe ziel zalig. (PROV. H. JOAN.) Een moeder sterft altijd te vroeg, al wordt zij nog zo oud.
Je bidt dat God haar sparen zal,

44.16 Other acquaintances in Wielsbeke and Meulebeke

The Declercqs, who hailed from Wielsbeke, were familiar with virtually every resident of the village prior to World War II. The population experienced a substantial surge due to a large influx of immigrants, as well as a post-war baby boom. Figure 44.135 showcases several notable mementos.

Een nieuwe harde slag voor deze diep beproefde familie! Nog bloedde de wonde veroorzaakt door 't verlies van een veelbelovenden zoon... Die wonde was grenzenloos diep en breed geslagen. Zij kon maar niet genezen en ondermijnde stilaan het sterk gestel van den moedigen man, tot zijn hart begaf onder het mateloos lijden.

Langs den weg "dien Jezus' lijden heeft geteekend" is hij gegaan. Zijn leven was een kruisweg en met Christus is hij gestorven op Calvarië. Thans is hij met Jezus verrezen tot het leven van onvergankelijke vreugde en in de zalige Godsaanschouwing is hij met de moeder van zijn talrijk kroost en de kinderen die hem voorafgingen voor eeuwig vereenigd.

De duurbare overledene was immer een eenvoudig, doorbraaf man, een oprechte en rechtzinnige katholiek, een voorbeeldige echtgenoot en vader, een eerlijk staatsburger en trouwe vriend. Zijn goedheid vooral straalde door gansch zijn persoonlijkheid.

BEMINDE ECHTGENOOTE en TEERGELIEFDE KINDEREN, ik begrijp dat mijn dood U oneindig bedroeft. Er is voor U allen maar één troost: de stellige hoop en de vaste zekerheid van het eeuwige wederzien. Troost U en schept moed: in de gemeenschap der heiligen blijf ik met U vereenigd. Vreest den Heer en bemint elkander, bidt voor mijn zielerust, dan komt de dag der blijvende vereeniging van gansch onze familie bij den Heer.

Mijn Jezus, barmhartigheid.

Chapter 45

Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) & Irma Helena Lesage

45.1 Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15)

45.1.1 Introduction, his Birth and Death

The author's grandparents are Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) and Irma Helena Lesage (DP12V03DW02L02).

Michel (DC15), shown in Figure 45.1 and 45.4, was born in 1906 in Wielsbeke, Belgium. His ancestors are shown in Figure 45.2. He was the son of Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14) and Marie Elodie Devenyn, and Irma Helena Lesage's husband (DP12V03DW02L02). He married Irma Lesage in 1932 and died in 1963 in Deerlijk, Belgium.

In this chapter, Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) is primarily described as a descendant of the Desclergues and grandfather of the author. He is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 64, as the husband of Irma Helena Lesage; Chapter 65, as the husband of Irma Helena Lesage, who was a great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as the husband of Irma Lesage, who was a great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68, as a descendant of the 't Kint family line; and Chapter 71 as grandson-in-law of Clemens Lammens.

He was a farmer and a flax merchant. In the last years, he held a trading post as purchasing manager in a multinational steel company (Bekaert NV) in Zwevegem, Belgium, co-owned by the Bekaert family described in Chapter 44.8.21, Chapter 44.10, Chapter 45.1.6 and Chapter 44.5.8.2.

Until his wife died in 1953, he took courses oriented toward this position while temporarily working in the company's production facility. The production of metal fibers must have appealed to him because of his experience with flax and linen branches. The fact that flax fibers are increasingly used in durable composites in our modern world would have fascinated him. He was receiving a position at Bekaert NV that resulted from his skills, connections, and qualities.

He was a distinguished gentleman with excellent technical knowledge of agriculture, specifically flax and the flax industry. Moreover, he had an eye for beauty and believed that a specialized product should be durable and beautiful.

Furthermore, like Baron Bekaert, he was very catholic, and, as explained in the previous chapter, his parents were acquainted with the Bekaert family. Michel and Irma were both Flemish, but they also spoke French fluently.

Michel had planned to buy a large farm and establish a new life with Irma at Cordes (Frasnes-lez-Avaing). The language would not have formed any problem, but Irma, raised in the devastated 'Westhoek' after WWI, refused to move to such a rural area. Hence, they made other plans.

Interestingly, Irma's sister's son would later move to Moustier at Frasnes-lez-Avaing with the same purpose, described in Chapter 64.7.7, just like Michel's sister would later move to Malève near Jodoigne, described in Chapter 44.5.2.

According to Agnes (1933-2018), the eldest daughter of Michel Declercq, her father had the most beautiful musical tenor voice she had ever heard. Perhaps she exaggerated slightly, but it indicates that he must have had a beautiful sound.

Even when his early career had passed, Michel, a proud gentleman, continued to describe himself as a farmer and flax merchant. His siblings have all been described in Chapter 44. He was the brother of Joseph Antonius Gerardus Declercq (1902-1980), Maria Antoinette Gerarda Declercq (1904-1989), Valentine Alida Declercq (1910-1939), Rachelle Gabrielle Declercq (1912-2007), Esther Ernestina Godeliva Declercq (1915-2011), and Judith Flavia Maria Declercq (1918-2007). Joseph was a farmer. Maria was a midwife. Valentine died soon after marrying. Rachelle was a teacher. Esther (Sister Ernestine) was a French and music teacher and has been a school principal and religious nun. Judith has been a nurse teacher and president of the Children's Welfare Organisation.

Michel Declercq was very ambitious and honorable and expected the same passion for his children and family. There are several anecdotes about him. For instance, when his brother-in-law Robert Courtens decided to become a middle school teacher at a technical school, Michel found this to be inferior. He told him he should aim higher or become a farmer and improve his future.

Also, he kept standing tall as a farmer and flax merchant during a difficult time, which was his identity. It required a lot of courage for him to switch professions after WWII. It is generally known that flax farmers and flax merchants were rather vain. They formed a community within the community.

Michel had nine children and was disappointed in the ones who did not meet his high expectations.

Consequently, they were also the ones who did not understand their father and his attitude towards them.

The author has spoken to many people who have known him. Inhabitants of Saint Louis in Deerlijk remember him as a skilled gentleman with vast expertise in farming and crops, an excellent nose for flax, and a man with technical skills and a sense for esthetics and culture.

As a young married man, he considered having many children a Christian duty. The author appreciates this attitude because otherwise, his father, one of the youngest children, would not have been born. Still, having so many children has had implications as well.

Michel was the second son of Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn. His parents were very progressive because, contrary to the mainstream, they wanted each child to have a proper education. Indeed, their children were brilliant students. The eldest son was destined to become a farmer and stay at the farm in Wielsbeke (Hof van Brussel), while the second son, Michel, leaned towards establishing his career. Being from Wielsbeke, along the Golden River (Lys or Leie), becoming a flax merchant was a natural choice. As a merchant and a handsome, fine young man, he was popular with the girls and had a potentially bright future.

In Chapter 44 and Chapter 64, we have explained how the Declercq and Lesage families have known one another since WWI. When Michel visited the area of Beselare to buy flax, he never hesitated to visit the Lesages, even when there was no flax to purchase. Indeed, farmland could only be used once a decade to cultivate flax. During one of his trade missions to villages in Beselare, he must have had an adorable encounter with Irma Lesage. When Irma met Michel, a charming and handsome flax merchant from a catholic family in Wielsbeke, she fell in love with him. She said that she wanted to marry this lovely gentry chap from Wielsbeke, and she did.

Trade journeys such as the one that got Michel and Irma to fall in love were mandatory. The area of interest was not limited to Flanders and covered the North of France (mostly Picardie) and even the Netherlands (Flevoland, Groningen, IJselmonde, Dordrecht, and Zeeland). Michel visited farms to purchase flax that he sold immediately or stored in Wielsbeke and later merchandised in Kortrijk.

The family Lesage-Lammens was a wealthy and very decent family of farmers. They had many children, and 3 of their sons had been soldiers during WWI. The cutest daughter was the youngest, Irma. Michel must have liked her since he agreed to the engagement, which would last a couple of years before the marriage.

As described in Chapter 44.5.5 and Chapter 64.7.12.5, Michel's sister Valentine and Irma's youngest brother Daniel would also have a relationship.

Irma was born in Moorslede, went to a French school there, and moved to Ledegem. When WWI started, she escaped with her mother to Oudezeele, France, while her father stayed at the farm in Ledegem with one of Irma's brothers, Paul, described in Chapter 64.7.8. After the war, Irma lived in the devastated areas of Beselare and Zonnebeke.

Life was difficult during the post-war reconstruction. Irma was determined never to marry a man from her village. Michel and Irma married at Beselare in 1932 but have had an affair since 1928. After the wedding, they lived in Wielsbeke in the household of the Declercq-Devenyn family, at the farm 'Hof van Brussel,' shown in Figure 45.5.

As mentioned, Michel hoped to buy a large farm at Cordes (Frasnes-Les-Avaing). Still, Irma Lesage, who had grown up in Westhoek's desolate country, destroyed during WWI, was not keen on moving to the middle of nowhere. Nevertheless, the language would not have formed any barrier because Irma thought in French and could speak and write the language very well. She had had her education in a French school at Moorslede and later at Oudezeele in France.

The young couple searched, instead, for a suitable farm in the area of the Leie River. However, a financial crisis suddenly diminished their savings due to the devaluation of the Belgian Franc. They had no choice but to invest their money in flax and hope to gain more money to later fulfill their dreams, a gamble that they lost. Michel's siblings would also partially consume their savings for education.

Paying back the investment would occur only after WWII. When prosperity returned, Michel and Irma built a beautiful house at Deerlijk (Oude Heerweg in Saint Louis).

During WWII, the family suffered the most because they had many young children. Flax trade was hardly possible, and Michel, a stubborn man, refused to work in an economy dominated by the German occupier.

Michel Declercq (DC15) died in 1963, as shown in Figures 45.6 and 45.7. His death was caused by heart disease as a result of the Figure 45.6: Transcript of the death certificate of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) at Deerlijk, on August 2, 1963. It was indeed Maurice A. Declercq (DC16) who took care of the administrative legacy of the family, as can be read in the certificate. Maurice Declercq also ensured that the grave of the parents Declercq-Lesage would not be emptied and destroyed after 50 years. When the tomb was damaged by wear and time, the author consequently moved them to a new family grave a few meters further so that they could last for several more decades. After all, they are the oldest existing remains of the Desclergue bloodline and de Patin side branch and deserve care and protection.

van
HEER MICHEL DECLERCQ
weduwnaar van
Mevrouw IRMA LESAGE

geboren te Wielsbeke, de 14 maart 1906 en schielijk overleden te St-Lodewijk, op 2 augustus 1963. Het H. Oliesel werd hem toegediend.

Heden is de mens en morgen is hij verdwenen.. (Nav. v. Christus.)

Een hartziekte heeft de dierbare overledene veel te vroeg uit deze wereld weggehaald. Sinds geruime tijd hing de dood hem boven het hoofd en hij wist het niet. Nog zovele plannen moesten worden uitgevoerd in en rond het huis dat hij met werkzaamheid en spaarzin had opgetrokken voor zijn dierbaar gezin. — Met beperkte krachten — werken was hem verboden geworden — wist hij toch nog een en ander te verrichten voor het welzijn van de zijnen : zo groot was zijn levenslust. Plots is daaraan een einde gekomen volgens de voorspellingen van de wetenschap, volgens de schikking van God... Heer, Uw Wil geschiede !

O Heer, die mij haastig hebt geroepen, Gij die zo goed en barmhartig zijt, heb medelijden met mij, wees mij genadig omwille van het christelijk geloof waaraan ik trouw geweest ben, omwille van de H. Sacramenten die ik regelmatig heb ontvangen ; omwille van de opdracht die ik als echtgenoot en vader in Uw dienst heb volbracht ; aanvaard mij in Uw Rijk om U te loven en te danken in eeuwigheid !

Dierbare kinderen, ik ga naar moeder, bidt allen elke zondag voor ons beiden in het H. Misoffer ; leert uw kinderen voor ons bidden, leeft schoon, leeft christelijk, opdat wij allen eens elkander voor eeuwig weervinden bij God !

Dierbare familieleden, gij niet het minst, mijn duurbare Zuster uit de Congomissie, geburen, vrienden en kennissen, gun mij en de mijnen uw vroom gebed.

Figure 45.7: *Left is the obituary card of Michel Declercq, August 2, 1963. His mentioned heart disease was likely Lyme carditis due to Lyme borreliosis, an infectious disease caused by the Borrelia bacterium spread by ticks. He turned from an energetic man into an aged person gasping for oxygen in as little as two years or so. The sentence 'leert uw kinderen voor ons bidden' came, with this book, to fruition. Figure 45.19: Comparison of Michel Declercq (top-center in 1946 and bottom-right in the 1920s) with two low-resolution postcards as shown in Figure 45.20. While we lack a pre-WWII photo of Michel with a mustache, he did sport one later in life. Unfortunately, a high-resolution version of the postcard in Figure 45.20 is unavailable. However, the figure on the postcards bears a closer resemblance to Michel Declercq than, for instance, the Vansteenkiste brothers, known for their mustaches. While not definitively proven, it is likely that the individual on the postcards is Michel Declercq. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Figure 45.21: The facsimile in Figure 45.20 was used for a multi-language postcard[a]. The Dutch spelling of 'rooten' suggests a publication before 1946 (Belgian Dutch) or before 1934 (Netherlands Dutch). Spanish and German on the card imply a publication before the end of the Spanish Civil War and before 1939 (when Nazi Germany invaded Poland), respectively. Hence, the picture likely predates 1939, aligning with the Declercq-Lesage family's involvement in the flax business in Wielsbeke before that time.

[a] Published by Nels, the card includes the phrases 'Le Rouissage en cuves. - Het rooten in Bassins. - Retting flax in tanks. - Das Rösten in Bassins. - Enriando el lino en cuvetas.'

Figure 45.22: In the middle, we see the statue ' Aandenken aan de Vlasser die tussen 1860 en 1960 door mateloos noeste arbeid de welvaart bracht aan de Golden River' , by R. Debucquoy, Wielsbeke (at the Church), April 23, 1988. It was thanks to Gerard Verbrugghe (described in Chapter 77) that the author was present during the inauguration of this statue in Wielsbeke in 1988. If only his grandfather Michel and great grandfather Ernest Constant had seen, they would have been very proud. The inauguration is also mentioned in Chapter 44.13 . (Declercq de Silva Archive) Furthermore, the compilation shows images of fields, filled with chapels, which formed landscapes that no longer exist today. Flax was often placed in 'chapels' to dry. The Leie River, with such chapels on its shores was absolutely regal. Finally, we can see 'Brakelen' (Flax cracking), a process that cracks the Flax stems without cutting. The purpose is to preserve the long fibers in the stem while breaking the stem tissue.

geboren te Zwevegem, op 9 december 1891, en aldaar overleden op 19 december 1961, gesterkt door de Genademiddelen van onze Moeder de Heilige Kerk en de Pauselijke Zegen "In Articulo Mortis".

Laten wij God danken omdat wij gedurende zoveel jaren de weldoende invloed mochten ondervinden van een buitengewoon mens : hij die ons geleid heeft op de weg der wijsheid, hij die ons geholpen heeft in onze dagelijkse moeilijkheden, hij die ons getroost heeft in onze beproevingen, is naar de Heer gegaan.

Het geluk en het welzijn van zijn volk, de eendracht onder zijn landgenoten waren zijn hoofdbekommernissen.

Geen nood liet hem onverschillig, voor geen opdracht week hij terug, geen moeilijkheid heeft hij ontzien. En wat gedaan moest worden, deed hij met warme liefde, en met geheel zijn hart.

Zijn rechtschapenheid, zijn jeugdig karakter en zijn innige overtuiging waren de grootste stuwkracht, waarmede hij zijn talrijke medewerkers bezielde.

Met de hulp van de Heer, in Wie hij gans zijn vertrouwen stelde, heeft hij zijn plicht volbracht. Met de hulp van de Heer is hij ook heengegaan, zoals hij geleefd heeft...
...in sterkte en in eenvoud.

Gij die hem lief hadt gedenk in uwe gebeden de ziel van Jongeheer
LEON BEKAERT
geboren te Zwevegem den 15 Oogst 1920
en bij den overtocht naar Engeland op zee omgekomen den 28 Mei 1940.

Hij had zijn volk en zijn Zwevegem lief. De Heer had hem veel talenten geschonken.

Hij was niet alleen verstandig, doch bezat daarbij een meer dan gewone wilskracht — hij was niet alleen opgeruimd en blijmoedig, doch ook ernstig waar het paste — en boven dat alles was hij eenvoudig en diep godsdienstig,

Hij was een schoone belofte en wij verwachtten veel van hem, wij allen : zijne familie, zijn Zwevegem en heel zijn volk in Kerk en Vaderland.

Onze Lieve Heer heeft er anders over beschikt : toen hij een laatste kans wilde wagen en met zijn trouwe makkers de zee overstak om zijn vaderland te gaan dienen, werd het schip in den grond geboord, en de zee verslond het met onze schoonste verwachtingen.

En toch is hij ons niet verloren : zijn beeld zal ons bijblijven zooals wij hem zagen heengaan in een frissche jeugd die nooit meer verwelken zal. Het zal ons steeds een aansporing zijn tot trouwe plichtvervulling en geestdriftige offervaardigheid in dienst van Kerk en Vaderland.

Dierbare ouders, geliefde zuster en broeder, bloedverwanten, en gij allen mijn vrienden en dorpsgenooten, weet dat God beter dan wij het « waarom » kent van deze zware beproeving, en laten wij onzen geest en ons hart onderwerpen. Van hierboven waak ik over U en de idealen die ons allen dierbaar waren.

Gedenkt mij in uwe gebeden.

Mijn Jezus barmhartigheid

AAN DE ZIEL VAN

Mevrouw
MARIE-ANTOINETTE BEKAERT
echtgenote van Mijnheer Max VELGE

Godvruchtig overleden te Brussel, de 16 februari 1963.

Een hart dat God zoekt heeft in het oog iets van Zijn stralende goedheid en liefde. Mijn hart heeft U gezocht, O Heer, en ik heb gehoopt uw goedheid als een stralende ster in m'n oog te dragen; een lichtende ster, die U kenbaar maakte aan de mens die U uit armoede niet kende of U dorst benaderen.

God heeft behoefte aan zielen vol goedheid en liefde. Het schoonste wat een mens van zich kan geven is z'n hart, geheiligd door Gods liefde en door het geven van z'n hart voor zijn medemens.

(St.-Augustinus.)

Zo minzaam in haar gesprek, zo rechtzinnig in haar omgang, voldoening en vreugde vond men in haar vriendschap.

(Sap. VIII)

Wij danken U o Heer voor die goede moeder die U ons gegeven hebt. Nu Gij ze tot U roept, zeggen wij vol droefheid : Uw wil geschiede, o Heer.

Ma vie s'est envolée comme la fumée! Ps.

Il ne vivait que pour son travail et toute sa joie, après Dieu, il la trouvait dans son foyer et dans sa famille. — D'une activité débordante, il semblait parfois vif, mais le fonds de son cœur était infiniment bon : le nombre de ses amis en témoigne ainsi que la tristesse de ses ouvriers qui perdent en lui un soutien et un protecteur plutot qu'un patron. Aussi quand la maladie le frappa la consternation fut générale : spontanément s'organisa, comme pour forcer le ciel, une offensive de prières et de pélérinages.

Dieu jugea bon de l'appeler à Lui : que sa sainte volonté soit faite.

Adieu, ma femme et mes enfants bien-aimés, vous ma joie et ma couronne pour qui j'aurais tant aimé vivre et travailler encore. Mon amour pour vous ne finira jamais et du haut du ciel je serai votre protecteur. — Mes chers enfants, soyez la consolation de votre Maman qui vous parlera souvent de votre Père. Priez avec elle car la prière est le véritable lien qui nous unit.

Soyez aussi, o mon Dieu, la consolation de mes chers parents dans cette terrible épreuve. Je sais qu'ils verseront des pleurs amers mais leur profonde foi chrétienne sera leur secours.

Mes chers frères et sœurs, comme nous étions unis ! Comme nous étions fiers l'un de l'autre ! Comme nous nous aimions ! La mort a tout brisé... mais non, car nous nous appuyons sur des promesses immortelles ; priez pour moi et un jour nous nous retrouverons au ciel.

Adieu ma chère famille, mes nombreux amis, mes fidèles ouvriers, adieu et priez pour moi.

Doux cœur de Marie, soyez mon salut !

Voor moeder waart gij een goede man, voor ons een liefdevolle vader, streng voor u zelf, streng maar goed voor de anderen. Uw groot geloof en uw rustige gelatenheid, zelfs in het aanschijn van de dood, zetten ons aan om in volledige overgave te zeggen : « Vader, Uw Heilige Wil geschiede ».

Voor ons en allen die u gekend hebben waart gij een man van gezag, van aanzien, maar bovenal van diep christelijk geloof. Gij hebt het aanschijn des Heren heel de dag door gezocht en in Gods tegenwoordigheid gewandeld. Zolang uw krachten het toelieten zocht gij elke morgen verkwikking voor uw ziel in de H. Communie en woonde godvruchtig de H. Mis bij. Onwankelbaar hebt gij door gans uw leven de weg van waarheid en goedheid gevolgd. Om uw rechtschapenheid werd gij alom door klein en groot geprezen. Steeds hebt gij in dienst van uw medemens gestaan met raad en daad. In uw leven, zolang gij hebt gekund, waart gij naarstig en bekommerd om de goede gang van de zaken, en dank uw schrandere geest hebt gij uw bedrijf tot hoge bloei opgedreven, maar dat onder de ogen van de Heer.

Voorbeeldige echtgenoot vondt gij steun en sterkte bij onze zo bezorgde, goede moeder ; schone liefde overkoepelde gans het leven van twee uitgelezen mensen. Dankbaar gelukkig en met ouderlijke fierheid hebt gij een van uw kinderen het altaar zien bestijgen : schoner bekroning van uw diep godsdienstig en christelijk voorbeeld hebt gij niet kunnen wensen.

De Heer heeft met welgevallen neergezien op zijn trouwe dienaar ; zacht en stichtend zijt gij de dood der rechtvaardigen gestorven.

Vader, zegen van uit de hemel onze goede moeder want zwaar is voor haar het afscheid. Sterk haar met uw voorspraak bij de Heer, opdat zij nog lange jaren de schutsengel van de familie zou mogen blijven. Wij van onze kant zullen nooit vergeten wat u, vader, voor ons gedaan hebt. Voor moeder zullen we een troost en steun zijn. Uw zoon priester zal u gans zijn leven in het H. Misoffer indachtig zijn, hij zal waken over broers en zusters en de kleinkinderen, zoals u het hebt gewild.

Uw broer en zuster, die in de dienst staan van de Heer, zullen meer dan ooit u indachtig zijn in hun gebeden en zij zullen uw geliefde kinderen steeds blijven bijstaan met hun zorgen en wijze raadgevingen.

Uw beminde zuster, die u zo genegen was, de vele bloedverwanten en vrienden zullen u niet vergeten in hun gebed.

H. Hart van Jesus, brandend van liefde tot ons, ontvlam ons hart van liefde tot U.

geboren te Kaprijke de 21 juni 1905 en godvruchtig overleden te Leuven de 11 april 1958, na ontvangen te hebben de laatste Heilige Gerechten en de Apostolische zegen « In Articulo Mortis ».

De kleine mens voelt zijn beperktheid en armzaligheid zó sterk aan wanneer hij staat voor de ondoorgrondelijkheid van Gods raadsbesluiten. Een man van formaat in dienst van Volk en Kerk, een waarborg en een belofte voor de toekomst, een leven in volle mannenkracht wordt door de Goddelijke Meester teruggeroepen op een ogenblik dat grootse verwachtingen op hem gespannen staan. Alleen de kristen mens kan, bedroefd doch deemoedig, het hoofd buigen en bidden : " Heer, al wat U behaagt is wel ! „

Vanaf zijn prilste jeugd heeft de dierbare overledene zich ingezet, met een taaie wilsvastheid, voor alles wat de arbeider en de arbeidersstand heilig en onontbeerlijk was.

Geen wonder dat zijn trouwe liefde, zijn vlijmscherpe geest en doorzicht, zijn durvende plannen hem brachten op de hoogste ladder van het sociale en openbaar leven.

In moeilijke omstandigheden, zonder onderscheid van rang en stand, heeft hij ontelbare mensen met raad en daad bijgestaan.

Onuitwisbaar zal zijn naam in de dankbare herinnering leven van tienduizenden mensen die door zijn initiatief, eigenaar geworden zijn van hun woning. Zoveel harten zullen de herinnering aan zijn voorliefde voor de zwakke kinderen bewaren.

Niet het minst voor de kristelijke arbeiders van de stad en het arrondissement Kortrijk als voor de provincie West-Vlaanderen waren zijn naam en zijn persoon een vlag en een zegeteken.

Met de meeste eerbied en in diepe erkentelijkheid buigen wij voor een groot leider en voorman, een volksvriend en een verbeten vechter voor de kristelijke, demokratische gedachte. Ons vroom gebed en de trouw aan het ideaal dat hij voorhield en nastreefde moge de beloning zijn voor zijn rusteloos en onbaatzuchtig streven.

GELIEFDE ECHTGENOTE, edelmoedig hebt gij voor mij en mijn levenswerk zware offers gebracht. De goede God alleen kan vergelden de bovenmenselijke toewijding en liefde gedurende de zes maanden van mijn pijnlijke ziekte. Mij te moeten missen zal wel het zwaarste sacrificie zijn, doch zoek troost en opbeuring bij de Heer die onze Vader is en ons eensdaags opnieuw verenigen zal.

DIERBARE FAMILIELEDEN, duizendmaal dank om uwe grenzeloze genegenheid en nooit ontziene zorgen - Blijft elkander beminnen en laat mij rekenen op uw gebed.

EN GIJ, trouwe vrienden en leden van de kristelijke arbeidersbeweging, houdt goede moed ! De Heer eist veel van U om veel te kunnen zegenen - Er is maar één weg : die van de liefde, de eensgezindheid en de trouw, geschraagd door een sterke Godsverbondenheid - Het blijve zó voor allen en altijd, en bidt voor mij.

45.1.2 His Early Youth

Michel Declercq was born in Wielsbeke, shown in Figure 45.8 in 1906, in Figure 45.3, at the height of the region's flax commerce. He was the third child of Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn. His elder brother Joseph was born four years earlier, while his sister Maria was born one year earlier.

His parents would soon recognize Michel as a child prodigy and expect him to have a career rather than continue the family farm. He received a proper education as described next. A beautiful school picture taken during WWI is shown in Figure 45.8.

A crucial period in his life must have been the German occupation of Wielsbeke during WWI. Figure 45.8 shows him as a young child in a school picture in 1916, while some events that must have been engraved in his memory are shown in 45.9.

He must have had a bad experience during the war or heard many horror stories just after the war. When the Nazzis occupied the region during WWII, he refused to participate in the economy under the occupation.

It can also be read in Chapter 64.6 about Emile Lesage (Michel's father-in-law), whom the two families had met at the end of WWI. As a result, the two families became business partners, and Emile's youngest daughter later married Michel.

45.1.3 His Education

Michel's primary school was the village school of Wielsbeke. The authorities took a picture during WWI at the convent of Wielsbeke, shown in Figure 45.10, on the occasion of the Americans sending provisions to the village. Indeed, the USA was neutral during most of the war and sent food to occupied Belgium.

Around 1919, Michel began his education at Sint-Amandscollege in Kortrijk, shown in Figure 45.11, together with André Demedts, described in Chapter 45.1.4.

Michel would soon find interest in attending school in Ghent, shown in Figure 45.12 because his auntie and André Demedts' uncle lived in Gentbrugge. André had been in school in Ghent at Sint Lievenscollege for a few months just after the war and must have talked about it to Michel.

When Michel was barely 16, he went to Ghent and studied at 'Sint-Barbara college,' organized by the Jesuits, while André had to stop and work on his parent's farm. During his education, Michel probably stayed at his Auntie Flavie's house or, at least, could visit her when needed. Flavie Declercq died in 1926 and is described in Chapter 43.5. The picture in Figure 45.12 was probably taken at the college dorm. Michel can be seen in the middle of the second row, the fourth person from the right, with a close-up in Figure 45.13. Being in such company as a young boy was quite remarkable. We can only speculate on the occasion of the picture and who was on it. It nevertheless indicates that Michel was an unusual boy.

Joseph, Michel Declercq's brother, had also been a student at Sint-Barbara the year before, at 19.

It is essential to repeat that André Demedts, unlike Michel, ended his education at 15 because he had to work on his parents' farm. Self-education, very likely with the help of books and discussions provided by Michel and his siblings, further transformed André into the talented writer he would become.

We don't know precisely until what age Michel Declercq studied but assume that he was already a flax merchant at the age of 21 because, at the age of 22, he sent a postcard, shown in Figure 45.88 on page 845, from Zelzate to his girlfriend, Irma Lesage. We assume that his presence at Zelzate was related to the flax industry rather than education.

45.1.4 His Friendship with André Demedts and Gabrielle Demedts

The reader may be interested in checking out Chapter 44.9 and Chapter 44.8.5 first.

André Demedts (Sint-Baafs-Vijve, Wielsbeke, 1906 - Oudenaarde 1992), shown in Figure 45.15, was a Flemish writer, son of Maurits Demedts and Celesta Vandenhende and grandson of Ivo Demedts.

His parents are described in Chapter 44.9 and were friends of Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn. André's sister was Gabriëlle Demedts (Sint-Baafs-Vijve, Wielsbeke, 1909 – Kortrijk 2002), equally a Flemish poet. The picture in Figure 45.14 was taken at the 'Paasfoor' of Kortrijk around 1927. In the photo, taken in a fake car at the carnival, we find the two Demedts siblings and five Declercq siblings.

Michel Declercq was born in Reynaertstraat (Hof van Brussel) in Wielsbeke in the same year as Andre Maurice Demedts, who was also born in Wielsbeke (Elsbos, Sint-Baafs-Vijve, Wielsbeke) in Drogenbroodstraat. Both farms of Declercq and Demedts were only 2 km apart, as explained in Figure 44.110 on page 790.

Michel was four months older than André. Michel's eldest son was named André, while the author's father would also be Maurice, the name of Andre Demedts' father. It is probably a coincidence that André Demedts' grandfather was Ivo Demedts, while Michel Declercq's grandfather was Ivo Declercq (DC13).

André's cousin, who frequently stayed with the Demedts family, was called Marcel and was also known by the Declercqs. Michel's second son was named Marcel, the father of Carolle.

André's sister was Gabrielle, equal to the second name of Maria Declercq.

Michel's mother was a single child and had lost her father early in her life. She was a strong, friendly, and emancipated woman who had decided, with her husband, to offer all her children, including their daughters, a good education. However, they lived in a rural village. One can only imagine how interesting the daily discussions at the dinner table of six studying youngsters in one family must have been, certainly when the Demedts siblings joined them.

To understand the life of André Demedts, we should highlight the passion of the Declercqs for overseas countries and, in particular, Africa. Around 1960, Sister Ernestine Declercq, described in Chapter 44.5.7, was in the Belgian Congo. Still, this passion for Africa was also part of their literature and a mission to spread knowledge and civilization to countries that needed it. Indeed, André Demedts would also spend energy on South Africa, as is described below.

André Demedts (Wielsbeke 1906—Oudenaarde 1992) was a Flemish writer and teacher. From 1949 to 1971, he was the director of Flemish Television in Belgium (BRT), the radio division of West Flanders. Demedts was a member of the Royal Academy for Dutch Language and Literature and was awarded the Triennial State Award. His oeuvre covered all genres.

In 1929, when Michel Declercq (DC15) was a flax merchant and was in a relationship with Irma Lesage, André Demedts was at the height of his ambitions as a writer and published his poetry debut Jasmijnen.

Later, he would also write novels, such as Voor de avond valt(1947), De ring is gesloten (1951), Geluk voor iedereen (1982), Veertien-Achttien (1985). Most noteworthy are the repression novel De Levenden en de Doden (1959) and the tetralogy De eer van ons volk (1973-1978), a rural epos set in the turbulent period around the French Revolution and partly based on Demedts' family history.

André Demedts is also known for a beautiful work he wrote on the life of writer Stijn Streuvels, shown in Figure 45.15, 'Stijn Streuvels, een terugblik op leven en werk' (1971). He has received numerous awards for his work.

We can notice his love for Africa in the bonds he established with South Africa. Indeed, he strived for cultural integration between Flanders, the Netherlands, and South Africa. As early as 1944, he paid attention to the Afrikaners' problems in the book 'Trouw aan hun Volk,' which he published under the pseudonym Koen Lisarde and set during the Boerenoorlog. Demedts regularly published in South African magazines and, in 1948, became a member of the Afrikaanse Skrywerskring, having become a member of the Maatschappij der Nederlandse Letterkunde in Leiden one year earlier. From that moment on, he became a permanent employee of the Zuid-Afrikaanse Tydskrif vir Letterkunde. He provided a column with reflections on the latest achievements in literature and literature from Flanders.

Also, Demedts was very much concerned about La Flandre in the North of France, particularly in the areas where Flemish is spoken and had been confiscated by Louis XIV, as can be found, for instance, in Chapter 34. It is no coincidence that Demedt's efforts to improve the Dutch language and culture still bear the most fruit in this area today.

The André Demedt Prize was created in Kortrijk in 1970. The prize aimed to award a person or organization that, entirely in the spirit of Demedts, had committed itself to the Flemish emancipation, the Dutch integration, the cultural contacts with South Africa, or the stimulation of cultural awareness in French Flanders. The prize is still awarded every two years in December.

André Demedts' legacy is best felt in his native village, Sint-Baafs-Vijve, Wielsbeke. In 1983, a genuine museum André Demedtshuis was built in the old rectory next to the Saint-Bavo church. It is an arts and culture center with monthly exhibitions, which houses the André Demedtsmuseum.

Critical to André Demedts, shown once more in Figure 45.15, was his unshakeable loyalty to the Christian faith, his country, and his people, similar to Michel Declercq (DC15). His Christian belief is something he, indeed, shared with Michel Declercq his entire life.

Gabriëlle Demedts (Wielsbeke 1909 – Kortrijk 2002), shown in Figure 45.16, sister of André Demedts, was a Flemish Belgian poet. 1934, she wrote her first poems, and in 1937, she published her first work, Een gevangene zingt.

As a young child, she was struck by Poliomyelitis, which has confined her life. She was very close with Valentine Declercq. Gabriel was born on June 11, 1909, while Valentine was born eight months later, on February 13, 1910.

When Valentine Declercq was ill in 1939 and knew she would die soon, Gabrielle wrote a poem for her, Zomer, on page 763.

Gabrielle Demedts also wrote a poem for Valentine when her relationship with Daniel Lesage had ended, Rustig Lied, shown on page 758, followed by Lage tonen, on page 758.

Finally, when Ernest Constant Declercq died, she wrote Ik heb gedaan for him, shown on page 793.

When Andre Demedts and Michel Declercq were born, we also find the birth of Karel Jonckheere in Ostend. The Declercqs and the Demedts knew his works. He is described in Chapter 44.5.7.3.

45.1.5 His Career as a Flax Merchant

The epicenter of flax merchandising in the world was the Kortrijk market. Flax was sold on Mondays, and money was trafficked from merchants to farmers. Although the merchants made the deals there, the actual transfer of goods took place either at the riverbank, at the train station, or in devoted warehouses. Money transactions regularly occurred in Kortrijk, even when flax was purchased or sold at a farm.

To gain money, a flax merchant had to forecast the quality of flax. The most exceptional quality looked blueish and consisted of excellent fibers. Flax class prediction was the connoisseur's job. The soil, the climate, the seeds, the shape of the early plants, the color, the speed of growth, the shine, and the flowers were all of primordial importance. Every aspect was carefully studied to estimate the ultimate quality and, therefore, the price a merchant was willing to pay in advance, hoping to sell at a high price once harvested and processed.

However, the venture was even more comprehensive. Indeed, the rate changed with time, depending on offer and demand. A merchant with a large house and a barn could store high-quality flax for one or more years until the price rose to a peak to sell at the highest profit. Even when low-quality flax had been bought, if stored correctly, it could be sold reasonably once the demand was high.

In some years, this constant gamble was a moderate risk; in others, it was devastating.

As described in Chapter 45.3 and Chapter 45.5, a devaluation of the Belgian Franc in 1935 forced Michel Declercq and Irma Lesage to postpone purchasing a farm and overpowered them to trade more flax. It made Emile Lesage somewhat anxious after a while because he worried that the money he had paid the couple when they married would evaporate. There were already three children before his death in 1938, and Emile expressed his worry to Michel. He suggested Michel purchase a farm at Cordes (Frasnes-Les-Avaing) and stop making babies.

Michel answered that it was his Christian duty to have more kids, while Irma refused to move to Cordes because she didn't like living in the middle of nowhere. So, the flax business continued, and evil years were yet to come.

As was made evident in Chapter 44.6, Michel, son of Ernest Constant, grew up in a family of flax farmers and merchants. In that chapter, we explain how flax is cultivated. Once flax was harvested, it was dried before transportation. A modern impression is shown in Figure 45.17.

A merchant who purchased 'straw-flax' (i.e., it is yet to be processed and typically transported to Kortrijk from France or the Netherlands) had to have the necessary skills to determine the quality. Good quality straw-flax met the following requirements: Good even stem length; Suitable consistent stem thickness; Few and highly branched; A root system with a straight, fine, white spindle root and many suction hairs (i.e., hair roots) spread over the root's entire length; Uniform white-yellow color; Smooth and vigorous straight stem; Good and even degree of ripeness; Free from disease and infection damage; The Flax must not be damaged; The highest possible purity was achieved when there were no weeds or earth residues.

45.1.5.1 retting or 'roten'

The purpose of retting is described in Chapter 44 to dissolve pectin and release the wood-like inner part of the stem from the fibrous outer part. Here we show an example of hot-water retting, in Figures 45.20 and 45.21, which happened at a water temperature of 32 degrees Celsius and occurred in 2 to 3 days, much faster than river retting that took a few weeks. The quality, in principle, was the same but was better controllable and reproducible. On average, one had to release 10% water daily and replace it with hot water of around 45 degrees Celsius to maintain a constant temperature. The timing was crucial. Retting had to continue until the experienced operator, after a quality check, noticed that the pectin was dissolved, and the time was right to remove the product from the water bath. Flax must swell during the process, which occurs efficiently when the mass ratio of flax/water is 10%. If more flax is used, the production cost per hot-water bath is the same, but the flax stems don't swell properly and reduce the final product's quality. Indeed, a retting process that occurs too slowly produces acids harmful to the fibers.

In particular, processing thin flax stems was risky because they were easily packed too densely. Thick flax was almost naturally stacked in a hot-water bath at the required 10% rate.

The flax merchant who provided flax carefully monitored the procedure, as shown in Figure 45.20. The most efficient retting companies immediately moved the flax bunches from the cart into the bath without intermediate stacking. Not only did it gain time, but it also reduced the risk of nestling and other side effects, which would complicate work afterward.

The person in Figure 45.20 could easily be mistaken for either Constant Vansteenkiste or Joseph Vansteenkiste from Wevelgem[1] because there are similarities, and they are well-known. On the back of the postcard[2], the process invented by Vansteenkiste is mentioned, but it does not state that the person on the card is Vansteenkiste.

We have performed an investigation using biometric methods, and neither Constant nor Joseph match[3]. Furthermore, the Vansteenkistes were born around 1870; by the time this picture was taken (around 1930), they would have been around 60, which is not the case for the person in the image.

In 1930, Michel Declercq was 24 years old and active as a flax merchant before marrying in 1932. Also, the glorious Belgian days of the Vansteenkistes occurred before 1920 and were somewhat discredited later for political reasons. One would not have risked placing them on a postcard in the 1920s or 1930s.

Although we don't want to exclude the possibility, the chances are higher that this was, in fact, Michel Declercq. The same biometric comparison methods used on Michel Declercq resulted in a closer match, as shown in Figure 45.19.

45.1.5.2 Drying or 'kapellen' , turning or 'keren'

After Flax had been removed from the*rootput*, it was thrown, as bunches, on a field at specific distances from one another so that workers could adequately construct chapels.

The task of kapellen was challenging and intensive, as shown in Figures 45.18 and 45.22. The purpose was to dry Flax efficiently. The chapel's angle was crucial because if it was too steep, it did not contain enough Flax or too much otherwise. If the inclination was too low, the fibers could bend, making further processing difficult. Incompetence to choose the right angle or perfectly bind the top of the chapel could destroy it in bad weather, either by the wind or by too much rain penetrating the stems.

Flax was then further processed to extract fibers like blond hair. The best Flax was called 'first class.' It's an expression still used in our family to state that something is perfect: 'Het is eerste klasse.' If a flax merchant had incidentally bought low-quality Flax, he used to say 'het is een buk.'

While the chapels were on the field, they had to be turned inside out, at least twice, to dry evenly. In some processes, Flax has retted more than once, and therefore, the procedure of forming chapels and turning or keren was repeated several times. The industry demanded skilled workers to handle this.

45.1.5.3 Breaking flax ('braken' or 'brakelen')

When flax was retted, the fibers were unbonded from the other tissue but not released. Flax stems had to be broken or cracked, shown in Figure 45.22 to reveal the threads, and then the undesired remains of the wood pipes were removed.

This could only be done when the flax stems were dehydrated because otherwise, the wood pipes did not break easily and were stuck onto the fibers during the scutching process described in Chapter 45.1.5.4. Indeed, the purpose was to retain only the beautiful threads and liquidate the rest for other purposes.

45.1.5.4 Scutching flax (zwingelen)

Scutching, shown in Figure 45.23, was initially done by tapping the flax parallel to the fibers to release the wood-like interior particles from the outer flax fibers in flax stems. Soon, the star mill or Stermolen was invented, i.e., the wheel to which fins were attached that beat the Flax 12 times per cycle. The machine was hazardous because it could hurt the head and the worker's hands without protection. Though safer and fully automated, modern machinery still uses this principle, as in Figure 45.23. Each flax stem contains between 30 and 40 fibers.

Flax appropriately dried and was scutched easily. The reason is that under the best circumstances, flax was bleached by ultraviolet sunlight while drying. This bleaching destroyed the retting process's slimy relicts and helped naturally release the particle from the flax fibers. Sophisticated producers of flax sometimes removed slime and particles while flax was still wet, called pressing, or persen because a press pushed muck out of the retted flax. In particular, the British detested the procedure because they did not like retting pits. Pressing was extra work but made the remaining processes run smoother. The decision to use this procedure depended on the additional cost compared to the benefit of time gained. It all depended on the circumstances, including the market value.

Scutching requires essential worker skills and experience. One had to transpose the 'handful of Flax sufficiently' to ensure the fins hit the insufficiently scutched stems. One also worked from top to bottom. The machine had to be set according to the thickness of the bunch of flax to be processed. The inexperienced worker could break the fibers or produce flax loins[4] of lousy quality and therefore equally useless. Even more so, he could easily break his fingers or hand.

After scutching, a vital side-product could also be further used, i.e., flax loaves or vlaslemen. These were used for the fabrication of plates or pellets. Line seeds were used for sowing new Flax [5] or for extracting oil. Linseed oil is, for instance, used in fine oil paint by artists.

[1] Constant Vansteenkiste was an inventor and is hugely respected in the industries he was involved in; Joseph was his brother and is less known.

[2] The back of the postcard reads " 12 – Het roten in bassins. De wetenschap zoekt het geheim der Leie op te sporen. Ontelbare roterijen werden sedert de oorlog opgericht waarin het vlas naar de methode van C. Vansteenkiste in 1904 toegepast in lauw water geroot het Leieroten niet enkel evenaart, maar zelfs te boven gaat. Le Rouissage en cuves. La science tache de decouvrir le pouvoir merveilleux de la Lys. A la suit de Constant Vansteenkiste qui en appliqua le principe en 1904 beaucoup de liniers utilisent avec succès le rouissage à eau chaude. Leurs produits egalent et surpassent actuellement les lins rouis à la Lys.' ' Postcard by Thill and Nels, Uitg. Van Melle, Burgstraat, 23 Gent

[3] The hairline shape and position are different, and the relative proportions of the face are also different. It is, therefore, unlikely that the person in Figure 45.20 is one of the Vansteenkiste brothers.

[4] Loins were a side product, called vlaslemen

[5] In that case, the farmer selected the most voluminous seeds.

45.1.5.5 Hackling flax (Combing or 'hekelen')

Combing flax removes particles and short fibers so that only perfect long threads remain the end product. Figure 45.24 dates from 1815-1830 and was based on the traditional flax processing, done in small quantities at the farm, where the farmer and his wife had separate tasks.

The wife traditionally did the cutting and spinning, while the husband was responsible for fieldwork, merchandising, and caring for the cattle. For instance, flax fibers were used by the Egyptians to make ropes and fabricated lines for mummification. Uniforms of soldiers in Europe also used to be made of flax. Sails on boats to cross the oceans were also made of linen.

45.1.5.6 Textile: Spinning and Weaving and how this process moved to neighboring areas

The Declercqs may have woven textiles, as seen in Figure 43.5 on page 720 concerning Leo Bernard Declercq (DC12). Therefore, we describe briefly how flax fibers were further processed. Weaving linen became very important from the 15th century onwards. Existing technology used for wool textile production could be used with minor adaptations.

In the context of our book, which described how our Declercqs arrived from Spain, in the area of Kortrijk at the end of the 16th century, it is interesting to find a quote[6] from Emperor Carlos V, which states,

'Ik vrees niets voor Vlaanderen, zolang de velden er vlas zullen dragen, er vingeren zijn om het te spinnen en armen om het te weven: de Vlamingen zullen altijd rijk zijn, zolang men de duimen van hun spinsters niet af en houwt!.'

In other words,

'I fear nothing for Flanders, as long as the fields will carry Flax, there will be fingers to spin it and arms to weave it: the Flemish will always be rich, as long as one does not cut off the thumbs of their spinners!.'

It's inevitable that the Declercqs when they were military in the 16th and 17th centuries, must have been aware of the existence and importance of Flax cultivation and linen production in Flanders. Later, their descendants would transform into farmers and merchants in subsequent generations. Combing and spinning were traditionally done before the product was sold to weavers. When large quantities were produced, spinning was even done by separate households before it was sold to weavers. For instance, in the area between Leie and Schelde, most of the population were farmers, spinners, or weavers. Spinning and weaving are shown in Figure 45.24 while bleaching and sewing are also shown in Figure 45.24.

The production of textiles by farmers existed on a small scale until around 1850. Making a living out of this activity became no longer possible because of competition with countries that produced fabrics cheaply, such as England. In 1845 and 1846, there was also a Typhus and Cholera epidemic in Flanders, which worsened the deplorable condition of farmers and workers. It was then that the Flemish switched to the production of flax fibers rather than textiles. They could again compete in the global market by specializing in what they were best at. This period was when the area around the Leie became the world center for processing flax from dry stems to fibers and the Leie River became the Golden River. Textile production occurred elsewhere, although it would remain in some specific regions, such as Deerlijk.

Flax retted in the Leie River was lighter in color, which was advantageous for textile production. Before WWI, the annual output of Flax in Flanders was between 100 million and 150 million kg.

Shortly after 1830, British and French companies specialized in spinning and weaving discovered Kortrijk and set up trade with the city. From then on, farmers and flax fiber producers could sell their products in Kortrijk, and that's how it became the world center for flax trade. Shortly after 1830, local merchants flourished and acted as an intermediary between producers and international purchasers. These intermediaries were also called bottenkopers. Indeed botte was a measure of quantity used in this business. The ubiquitous presence of British sales associates is how soccer and tennis were introduced in Kortrijk, not to mention a sense of high society. People from the surrounding villages often referred to inhabitants of Kortrijk as dikke nekken (big heads). Of course, the English term Golden River also comes from the British. The industrialization of flax production occurred around 1900 when hand-driven machines were replaced for those who could afford them by mechanized systems, usually driven by steam or electricity. This era was when small factories rose in the area where workers had jobs as zwingelaars.

One could trade flax anywhere. As narrated earlier, flax was often bought in situ at farms. Nevertheless, there was one place frequented by flax merchants every Monday to meet everyone in the flax business, learn about new developments and the international situation, and meet old friends. This place was Kortrijk, as mentioned earlier. It was the epicenter of flax in the world. It was also the place for the farmer to buy linseed or equipment and meet possible buyers for their flax.

The financial crisis of the 1930s hit the industry hard. Further modernization was necessary, such as hot water (32 degrees Celsius) retting, which was more efficient and could be done all year round and not necessarily near the River. Also, a zwingelturbine was developed. River retting was forbidden from 1943 onward. The Declercqs remained attached to flax long after quitting traditional trade, as seen in Figure 45.25.

45.1.6 His Acquaintance with the Bekaert Family

The reader may be interested in reading Chapter 44.5.8.2, Chapter 44.8.20, and Chapter 44.10 first.

Michel Declercq's experiences in flax were advantageous for his contacts in the industry and other fields. His interest in flax fibers must have triggered further interest in metal fibers produced by Bekaert NV in Zwevegem. His father, Ernest Constant, also had a network in the cultural world, as described in the previous chapter. They were also distantly related, as explained in the mentioned chapters.

Bekaert was active in the steel processing industry and reduced production during WWII to a level that was just sufficient to pay bills and workers. Michel appreciated this 'soft resistance.'

When Judith, Michel Declercq's youngest sister, established a new college for nurses at Kortrijk and became the Children's Welfare Organization president, she often met with the Bekaert family and strengthened the bonds even more.

At some point, Michel was asked by Leon Bekaert to work for him, to which he agreed. It was when life was tough for the Declercq–Lesage family economically. After receiving additional education, Michel became a purchasing manager in this multinational company while taking responsibility for the production department.

His sons would later continue to enjoy the established connection. Some memorabilia are shown in Figures 45.26, 45.27, 45.28, 45.29, 45.30 and 45.31.

45.2 Irma Helena Lesage

45.2.1 Introduction, Birth and Death

Irma, shown in Figure 45.34, is primarily described here as the wife of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) and the author's grandmother. Her early death has been traumatic for her children and has determined their lives. In that respect, every tiny relic is of high value, such as her signature in Figure 45.35.

She is equally referred to in the following chapters: Chapter 64, as the daughter of Emile Theophile Lesage; Chapter 65, as great-great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); Chapter 66.1, as great-great-great-granddaughter-in-law of Barbara Benoit; Chapter 66.2, as the great-great-great-great-granddaughter of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; Chapter 68; and Chapter 71 as the granddaughter of Clemens Lammens and Natalia Juliana Decaestecker. Her closest ancestors are shown in Figure 45.36, while Figure 45.37 explains how she is connected to the de Patin family.

Irma Helena Lesage (Moorslede, February 21, 1905 - Kortrijk, June 7, 1953) was the youngest daughter of Emile Theophile Lesage and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens. Her birth is shown in Figure 45.38. She had two younger brothers, Oscar and Daniel. Her elder sisters were Marta, Amanda, Maria and Godelieve. Her elder brothers were Cyrille, Gerard, Hector, and Paul.

During her childhood, Irma went to a French school in Moorslede. In Oudezeele, she continued school in French. After the war, she went to school in Zonnebeke.

Before WWI, her family moved from Moorslede, Statiestraat 518, to Ledegem, where they purchased a farm at Kortwagenstraat 33.

Irma was nine years old when WWI commenced. Her mother fled, with most children, to Oudezeele in the North of France, while her father stayed behind with her brother Paul in Ledegem. In France, the family remained with Secq at Route des Trois Rois 77, the road from the village center to Café des Trois Rois. The house was located near the village center and was designated number 49 on the list of homes of refugees at Oudezeele during WWI.

Irma lost her eldest brother Cyrille, a soldier, in 1916, described in Chapter 64.7.1. At the war's end, she lost her other brother Hector, also a soldier, described in Chapter 64.7.6. Another brother, Gerard, described in Chapter 64.7.5 and equally a military, became a victim of a gas attack and suffered from health issues until he died in 1933. Before his death, he witnessed the wedding of Irma Lesage and Michel Declercq at Beselare.

The family had moved to Beselare on September 30, 1921, at Spilstraat 12 on Keiberg, at the junction with Slangemeersstraat.

Irma's father and her brother Paul had first stayed in Ledegem during WWI but were expelled by the Germans on July 23, 1917, and went to Wielsbeke. They survived a few months at the Declercq family's farm, Hof van Brussel. Paul, severely injured on July 23 due to a bombardment at Ledegem, found a contemporaneous companion in the eldest son of the Declercq family. Later, Irma would marry the second eldest son of the Declercq family, Michel Declercq (DC15), the author's grandfather.

Irma died in 1953, as shown in Figure 45.40.

The death of a mother is always unfortunate, traumatic, and dramatic. The experience was not different with Irma Lesage. She had nine children. Maurice Declercq (DC16), the author's father, was only twelve.

Irma Lesage's cause of death started with a reasonably banal volvulus. The latter occurs when a loop of the intestine twists around itself and the mesentery supporting it, resulting in bowel obstruction. This was undoubtedly not life-threatening and could have been treated surgically or otherwise easily. However, Irma was so concerned about her children and household that she delayed a doctor's visit. Ultimately, the situation was so severe that Michel Declercq (DC15) took her to the hospital in Kortrijk, where she was operated on immediately by Dr. André Baekelandt, uncle of Dr Guido Baekelandt, who saved the life of Irma's son Maurice Declercq (DC16), the author's father, in 1961, as described in Chapter 46.2.6.

The procedure was successful, but the surgeon pronounced that it was too late and that she was already heavily infected. She reportedly was capable of talking to her children but died shortly after that.

Everyone in Deerlijk was shocked by the sudden death of this dear mother, who had endured hard times during WWII. Even people who can still retell always start their story with 'She was such a sweet and good woman...' Her death was undoubtedly a tragedy for the children.

Irma was buried in bare soil in Sint Lodewijk, Deerlijk, with a simple cross, which, one day, would have been replaced by a decent tombstone.

However, a single father with nine developing children had numerous vital tasks on his priority list.

When her husband, Michel Declercq, died ten years later, the children finally bought a beautiful tombstone for their parents. The reader can find more information about this in the sections on the family grave, Chapter 45.8 and Chapter 64.7.10.

As a reference, Irma Lesage died the week after Queen Elizabeth II of England's coronation, Empress of the British Empire and Queen of Ceylon, shown in Figure 45.41. It's an event that Irma must have experienced on the radio the week before she died.

45.2.2 The early days in Moorslede

As mentioned above, Irma Lesage was born at Statiestraat 518 in Moorslede, near the station. She spent her early youth there and went to a French school in the village. Not long before WWI, she moved with her family to Ledegem. Being the youngest daughter in a family with wealthy parents and caring brothers and sisters, she must have had a delightful youth until 1914. Impressions of Moorslede are shown in Figure 45.43.

Moorslede became a German stronghold during WWI, as seen in Figure 45.42. At that time, Irma lived with her mother in Oudezeele in Northern France. The street where Irma was born and resided before WWI can be seen in Figure 45.44. The scene shows a little chapel, Kapelleke van de Veldhoek, where Irma undoubtedly prayed as a child. Irma Lesage attended school in Moorslede at Pensionat Ten Bunderen, shown in Figure 45.45, where she was educated in French. In the summer of 1914, when she was merely nine years old, WWI began, and she moved with her mother to Oudezeele in the North of France, where she recapitulated her education in French until the end of the war.

Therefore, until the age of 15, she was educated in French. Consequently, she spoke and wrote French very well but wrote Dutch with dialect influences and in an old spelling learned from her mother, sometimes blended with French phonetics. An example[7] is '... kan Zondag niet koomen. Hij gaat naar Kortrijk naar de paardekours.' She also used some literal translations from French, such as 'puis il y viendra le Dimanche,' which she wrote as 'hij zal dan komen daar naar de zondag.'

Her siblings were also fluent in French. It is not exceptional that her father suggested in the 1930s that she and Michel Declercq (DC15) would purchase a farm at Cordes (in Frasnes-Les-Avaing in Belgium, where the villagers spoke French). She prayed and sung in French.

Because Irma Lesage had a French and catholic education, we know what orisons she prayed[8]:

Notre Père qui es aux cieux,
Que ton nom soit sanctifié;
Que ton règne vienne;
Que ta volonté soit faite sur la terre comme au ciel;
Donne-nous aujourd' hui notre pain quotidien;
Pardonne-nous nos offenses comme nous pardonnons à ceux qui nous ont offensés;

BID GOD VOOR DE ZIEL van
Vrouw IRMA LESAGE
echtgenote van Heer Michel Declercq geboren te Moorslede, de 20 Februari 1905 en overleden te Kortrijk, de 7 Juni 1953, na ontvangen te hebben de HH. Gerechten.

Uit de diepten roep ik tot U, o Heer: Heer geef gehoor aan mijn stem! Zo gij op ongerechtigheden acht geeft, Heer, o Heer, wie zal bestand zijn? Want bij U is verzoenlijkheid, en wegens uwe wet verbeid ik U, o Heer! (De profundis).

God is de meester van leven en dood, Hij die het begin van het mensenleven vast stelde bepaalt er ook het einde van. Hij roept de zielen terug wanneer Hij wil, en op de manier die Hij verkiest.

De wegen der Goddelijke Voorzienigheid zijn ondoorgrondelijk; toch blijft de ware kristen er in vertrouwen.

Laten we bidden zoals Jesus-Christus het ons leerde: « Onze Vader die in de hemelen zijt, Uw wil geschiede op aarde als in de hemel... »

Duurbare echtgenoot, onverwachts treft u dit scheiden. Bid God dat Hij u helpe uw zware taak tot een goed einde te brengen.

Dierbare kinderen, gehoorzaamt aan uw vader, troost hem, eert en bemint hem opdat de Heer u allen zegene. Vergeet uw moeder niet in uw gebeden.

H. Hart van Jezus, ik heb betrouwen op U!

Michel Declercq was 47 years old when he reported his wife's death and was temporarily employed in the production process at Bekaert NV company before becoming a purchase manager. On June 7, 1953, Irma had died at quarter past seven at the hospital of Kortrijk in Budastraat. Right is he obituary card of Irma Lesage, June 7, 1953. From her legacy through her descendants, we also know that she sang 'Viens, poupoule' to her children, by Félix Mayol, shown in Figure 45.46.

The lyrics of Viens, poupoule are:

Le samedi soir après l' turbin
L' ouvrier parisien
Dit à sa femme : Comme dessert
J' te paie l' café-concert
On va filer bras dessus bras dessous
Aux galeries à vingt sous
Mets vite une robe faut s' dépêcher
Pour être bien placés

Car il faut
Mon coco
Entendre tous les cabots
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Quand j' entends des chansons
Ca me rend tout polisson
Ah !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Souviens-toi que c' est comme ça
Que je suis devenu papa.
Un petit tableau bien épatant
Quand arrive le printemps
C' est d' observer le charivari
Des environs de Paris
Dans les guinguettes au bord de l' eau
Au son d' un vieux piano
On voit danser les petits joyeux
Criant à qui mieux mieux
Hé le piano !
Tu joues faux !
Ca n' fait rien mon petit coco.
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Ce soir je t' emmène .. où ?
à la cabane bambou
Hou !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Et l' on danse plein d' entrain
La 'polka des trottins'
Avec sa femme un brave agent
Un soir rentrait gaiement
Quand tout à coup jugez un peu
On entend des coups de feu
C' était messieurs les bons apaches
Pour se donner du panache
Qui s' envoyaient quelques pruneaux
Et jouaient du couteau
Le brave agent
Indulgent
Dit à sa femme tranquillement :
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Pourquoi les déranger
Ça pourrait les fâcher
Ah !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Ne te mets pas en émoi
Ils se tueront bien sans moi
Deux vieux époux tout tremblotants
Marient leurs petits enfants
Après le bal vers les minuit
La bonne vieille dit
A sa petite fille tombant de sommeil :
Je vais te donner les conseils
Qu' on donne toujours aux jeunes mariés
Mais le grand-père plein de gaieté
Dit doucement :
Bonne maman
Laisse donc ces deux enfants
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Les petits polissons
N' ont pas besoin de leçons
Ah !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Je suis bien certain ma foi
Qu' ils en savent plus que toi
Les jeunes mariés très amoureux
Viennent de rentrer chez eux
Dans leur gentil petit entresol
Ils crient : Enfin seuls !
Madame se met vite à ranger
Sa petite fleur d' oranger Pendant que Monsieur bien tendrement
Dit amoureusement
Pour tâcher
De s' épancher
Montrant la chambre à coucher :
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Les verrous sont tirés
On pourra se détirer
Ah !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Viens chanter mon coco
La chanson des bécots
Un député tout frais nommé
Invitait sa moitié

A venir entendre un grand discours
Qu' il prononçait le même jour
Mais à peine a-t-il commencé
Qu' on lui crie : C' est assez
Constitution ! Dissolution !
Pas d' interpellation !
Ahuri
Abruti
Il prend son chapeau et dit :
Refrain
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
Je ne veux pas devenir sourd
Pour vingt-cinq francs par jour
Ah !
Viens, Poupoule !, Viens, Poupoule ! viens !
C' est bien assez ma foi
D' être attrapé par toi.

Before WWI, the neighboring village of Beselare was also cute and would equally be destroyed by the violence of the war. Irma would move to Beselare after the war. Some impressions of Beselare before and early during WWI are shown in Figure 45.47.

45.2.3 Her stay at Oudezeele during WWI

In Chapter 64.6.2, a description is given of the stay of Eudoxie Lammens with her children, including Irma Lesage, at Oudezeele in the North of France. Apart from the constant worry about her brothers, soldiers, and father, who had stayed behind at Ledegem in Belgium with one son, Irma probably had a good time in Oudezeele.

The author remembers a couple of visits with her youngest brother, Daniel Lesage, described in Chapter 64.7.12, to the house where she stayed. The tree where they used to play was still there in the 1980s. Going to school in the village, shown in Figure 45.48, must have been easy for Irma because she had already been at a French school in Moorslede before WWI. It is said that the numerous shell impacts and explosions at the front could easily be heard at Oudezeele and beyond.

Therefore, we know that she must have experienced the noise of horror.

45.2.4 Her Post-WWI Life in the Devastated Front Zone

After the war, the Lesages had to establish a new life. They had lost two sons and also their farm. The whole region was devastated. The gradual destruction during the war can be seen in Figure 45.49.

The family decided to launch the eldest son Gerard as a farmer with his wife, Magdalena Meersseman, described in Chapter 64.6.2.7.4, to establish a stable position for Paul, who had been severely injured, described in Chapter 64.7.8, and to build a new farm, shown in Figures 45.53, 45.54 and 45.55, for the rest of the family in Beselare. Initially, the area looked like a lunar surface, and the family lived separately. Streets had vanished, points of reference had been destroyed, trees had disappeared, and most inhabitants would never return.

Family barracks, as in Figure 45.50, were erected soon after the war, and temporary schools were established in whichever military shelter.

There was hardly any time for diversion. Everyone had to work very hard to resurrect the villages. Some children could go to school in Zonnebeke, such as Irma, shown in Figure 45.51. Others had to go to other areas, such as Daniel and Oscar Lesage, who went to Beitem near their original home in Ledegem, probably residing with Gerard Lesage.

45.2.5 Acquaintances of Irma Lesage

In Irma's school picture of 1919, in Figure 45.51, we can see that her presumed school principal was Priest Gerard Lammens. He was rather famous. We are unsure if he was related to her mother, Eudoxie Romanie Lammens.

His tomb still exists and is shown in Figure 45.56. His death is also shown in Figure 45.56. The Lesage family was also acquainted with the Camerlynck family.

Some memorabilia are shown in Figures 45.57, 45.58, 45.59, 45.60 and 45.61.

From the village of West-Rozebeke, where Emile Theophile Lesage was born, the family also knew priest Camiel Forrez, as shown in Figure 45.62.

Figure 45.43: Pre-WWI scenes of Moorslede are shown, such as the castle at Koekuithoek, Kerkstraat, the market square Bruelstraat. The author visited Bruelstraat frequently in the early 1980s. We can also see a photo that the Germans probably took at the beginning of the occupation before the allies charged the village in the following years. The reader will also observe the farm of 'father Lievens' (pater Lievens) and the ancient castle of Moorslede, which also appears in the ancestry of de Patin in Chapter 65.5.2. One can also see access roads to the village, rope makers on the street, the back of the boarding school, Brouwerijstraat, and the train station where Irma Lesage was born nearby. There is also a street scene shown in Moorslede at the beginning of the German occupation in 1914 when the horses had not yet been confiscated.

Figure 45.44: The 'Kapelleke van de Veldhoek' in Moorslede. In May, the picture was taken when traditionally, people, primarily children, gathered to pray. Based on the clothes and the estimated age of the trees near the chapel and in the background, we assume that the picture was taken 10-15 years after WWI, i.e. around 1930. In Veldhoekstraat, there is no chapel anymore. We, therefore, believe that it must have been destroyed during WWII or for other reasons. Based on the picture taken in the evening, we know that the camera was aiming south. The chapel does not look new, so we assume it survived somehow WWI. On the horizon is 'Satiestraat' , where Irma Lesage was born in 1905. As a child, she must have visited this chapel too. A modern view is seen at the junction of Scherminkelstraat and Veldhoekstraat, in the south direction. An areal view (Google Maps®) of the soil is also provided, where we found a good match between the landscape on the picture and the current landscape. The photo reveals where the chapel of 'Veldhoek' was once located.

Mijnheer Remi & Mevrouw Lucie CAMERLYNCK
geboren te Passchendaele den 19 December 1902 en godvruchtig in den Heer ontslapen te Rousselare op de Vigilie van O.L.V. Hemelvaart 1922 versterkt door de genademiddelen onzer Moeder de Heilige Kerk.

Zij was lid van de O.L.V. Congregatie.

Van jongs af bloeide de wijsheid in haar en zij nam voor ze te beoefenen; zij streefde ijverig naar het goede. Eccl. li.

Ootmoedig en zachtmoedig naar Jezus' voorbeeld (Matth. xi. 29) was deze wijze en voorzichtige maagd de kroon, de vreugd harer ouders. (Phil. iv. 1) Zij was hun hulp, het licht hunner oogen, de troost van hun leven. Tob. x. 4.

Haar glimlach spreidde geluk in het huisgezin — zooals de opgaande zon strekte haar deugdenglans tot sieraad van den huiskring. Eccl. xxvi. 21.

En in dien breederen kring harer vriendinnen was zij een stichtend voorbeeld, door haar verstandige en diepe godsvrucht, haar ongekunstelde eenvoudigheid, haar innemend en liefderijk voorkomen. — Vroeger reeds, ter school, hadden heur medeleerlingen haar die treffende getuigenis harer achting & genegenheid bewezen met ze eenparig te verkiezen aan 't hoofd der Maria-Congregatie. — 't Was dan ook op den Vigiliedag harer Hemelvaart dat Maria, de lieve Hemelmoeder, haar trouwe kind en congreganiste, dat hier zoo oprecht en zoo ijverig zijn Moeder verheerlijkt had, (Vigilie Mis, Epist.) met zich ten Hemel medevoerde, om het aan de blijdschap van haar Feest te laten deelnemen. Vigiliemis, Coll.

In korten tijd immers geraakte zij tot de volmaaktheid (Sap. iv); het lijden heeft ze gezuiverd en in haar beproeving opende zij den mond niet om te klagen maar tot het einde verdroeg zij haar leed met vreugde en uit liefde tot God. Ps. xxxvii - Mach. vi.

Daarom was haar ziel Gode welgevallig. Hij haastte zich - een weldaad die Hij doet aan zijne uitverkorenen - ze uit het midden der boosheid weg te nemen. Sap. iv.

Teergeliefde Ouders & Broeders, Beminde Bloedverwanten, troost u in uwen aardschen rouw; denkt dat ik het beste deel verkiezen mocht. (Feestmis, Evang.) Richt uwe blikken hierboven, waar ik voort uw vreugde, uw troost, uw hulpe blijven zal. Ik dank u zoo innig om uwe liefdevolle zorgen. — Och we scheiden niet: wij blijven vereenigd in dien liefdeband van Jezus Heilig Hart, die ons, hier op aarde, zoo nauw vereenigen mocht. En gij, mijn Eerw. Oom, gedenk mij voort bij Jezus' minzaam Hart, aan het altaar des Heeren.

Voorzitter van de kerkfabriek St.-Audomarus
Oudstrijder 1914 - 1918

† " Ik heb de goede strijd gestreden . . .
Nu ligt voor mij de krans der gerechtigheid " (St - Paulus).

Echtgenote en kinderen, het kerkbestuur en de ganse parochiegemeenschap van Passendale, talrijke vrienden van dichtbij en veraf, en een schare van mensen die hij als gemeenteraadslid - schepen - burgemeester of notaris in zijn lange ambtsperiode korrekt en trouw heeft gediend, rouwen om het vrij onverwacht afsterven van deze edele man, "de notaris" zoals iedereen steeds met respekt over hem sprak.

" Zijn wegen waren recht als zuilen van een kerkgewelf, al voerden zij met wisselende kansen onder een boog van doornen- en lauwerkransen:
hij bleef in voor- en tegenspoed zichzelf ".

Gesproten uit een familie waar rotsvaste principen over 'opvoeding' en 'leven' de 'kerk in het midden' hielden, is hij opengebloeid tot een ware persoonlijkheid: een sterk gestel, een gestaalde wilskracht en fijne zelfbeheersing, de wijsheid van Salomo gepaard aan een gezond verstand, onkreukbaar eerlijk en recht, met een taai doorzettingsvermogen en een nooit aflatende werkkracht, een principieel en onomstootbaar geloof dat vorm gaf aan hemzelf en aan zijn gezinsopbouw ...

En dit alles was niet het resultaat van een bestendige en aandachtige zelfkontrole, maar eenvoudig door gewoon 'zichzelf' te zijn. Alles was 'natuurlijk' aan hem, ongemaakt en ongedwongen: zijn voornaam optreden en voorkomen, zijn intens aanvoelen en meeleven, de mildheid waarmee hij de mensen met hun problemen beoordeelde, zijn geduld, zijn levensstijl, zijn beheerste vreugde en zijn deugddoende vriendschap. Niet te verwonderen dat zijn 57 jaar notariaat zo'n druk cliënteel kende; immers zoals van de wijze Salomo kan men van hem zeggen: "God gaf hem wijsheid, een machtig verstand, een geest wijduitstrekkend als het zeestrand. Uit alle streken kwam men om zijn wijsheidswoord" (2 Kon. IV,29-34)

Gevoelig als hij was kende hij diepe vreugde wanneer hij mensen hartelijk mocht 'dienen', maar evenveel pijn bezorgden hem onbegrip en onrechtvaardige bejegening.

Volledig opgaand in zijn vele werk verdrong hij iedere gedachte aan ziek - worden of dood - gaan, maar realistisch en moedig als Judas Machabeus liet hij zich niet uit zijn lood

« QUE TES ŒUVRES, MON DIEU, SONT BELLES ! »

Cette prière - véritable cri d'adoration et de louange - résume magnifiquement toute la vie de Monsieur le Chanoine CAMERLYNCK. Homme de cœur et d'esprit, chef ardent et dynamique, prêtre fidèle et joyeux, bâtisseur infatigable et artiste prodigieusement doué, il rêvait d'une vie grande et belle. Il l'a réalisée au-delà de toute mesure en donnant, dans un amour passionné pour les jeunes, le meilleur de lui-même jusqu'à l'épuisement de ses forces... Tout dans sa vie comme dans sa mort, fut pour le bonheur des autres et pour la gloire de Dieu.

SON ŒUVRE

« D'une prairie informe et fangeuse, vous avez fait surgir ce complexe moderne et lumineux. Dans une région oubliée, vous avez créé un centre culturel rayonnant. Cette jeunesse négligée, vous l'avez rassemblée pour lui apprendre à servir Dieu par l'esprit et par le cœur. De ciment et de roc, de sueur et de peines, vous avez édifié une forteresse invincible, résistant victorieusement aux assauts de l'indifférence et du matérialisme, un symbole saisissant de l'Eglise en marche, un témoignage vivant d'une jeunesse qui peut encore chanter cet idéal qui vibre dans son âme. »
(Adresse d'hommage d'un rhétoricien, mars 1961)

SON MESSAGE

« Je souhaite que tous, vous ayez un jour ce bonheur de voler en caravelle à dix mille mètres de hauteur... C'est de là que le monde est sublime... Montez, montez, avec vos âmes, prenez de l'altitude... Et la caravelle qui vous y mènera, c'est le don total de soi. Se donner aux autres, faire de sa vie quelque chose de beau, de noble et de généreux, voilà la caravelle qui vous mènera à une hauteur d'où vous verrez le monde ensoleillé par Dieu dans toute sa beauté. »
(Allocution de Monsieur le Chanoine Camerlynck, mars 1961)

LE COLLÈGE SAINT-HENRI

« Je vois le Collège comme une magnifique caravelle qui s'en va vers la gloire, vers la prospérité. Une caravelle à trois mâts où sont arborés les drapeaux : DIEU, PATRIE et HONNEUR...

... je prendrai ma patène et mon calice et dans un geste d'offrande je prierai, je sacrifierai pour que le voyage de ma caravelle soit un voyage de bonheur et de prospérité.

... je souris devant l'œuvre accomplie, devant la grâce que le bon Dieu m'a accordée. Car si j'ai réalisé tout cela, c'est grâce au bon Dieu, croyez-moi.

Dieu est ici au centre de ce Collège et Il doit y rester. »
(Discours d'adieu, juin 1961)

Bij zulk een verlies kan het geloof alleen ons vertroosten: de duurbare overledene ook leefde uit zijn geloof. (Rom. 1. 17.)

Van kindsbeen af in de vrees des Heeren opgevoed, was hij Christen in den echten zin des woords: openhertig en rechtzinnig katholiek, vurig en wijs in zijne godsvrucht strekte hij tot voorbeeld van allen die hem naderden. (Job. II, 13.

Begunstigd met eenen schranderen geest en een onvermoeibare werkzaamheid, stelde hij die gaven van den Heer ten dienste van zijnen evenmensch, bij zoo verre dat hij eenigzins mocht zeggen met den H. Paulus: „Ik ben alles voor allen geworden"; en inderdaad, hoeveel noodlijdenden heeft hij niet geholpen, hoeveel hopeloozen wijzen raad gegeven, hoeveel medeburgers dienst bewezen.

Vol zachtmoedigheid en goedheid, aangenaam in zijne woorden, gespraakzaam en vriendelijk met eenieder, wist hij de genegenheid van allen te winnen. (Math. xv.)

Zijne kinderen zijn opgestaan en hebben zijnen lof uitgesproken. (Jud.)

DUURBARE VROUW, te vroeg is het uur der scheiding gekomen! Te zamen hebben wij lief en ook 't leed gedragen waarvan gij alleen de zwaarte hebt geweten, dank om uwe liefde en uwe opoffering van alle dage; wees getroost bij de zoete gedachte dat ik onze lieve Agnès ben gaan vervoegen bij den Heer: daar zien wij ons eens weder en niets zal onze liefde nog kunnen scheiden. TEERGELIEFDE KINDERS, eert uwe Moeder al de dagen van uw leven, dient den Heer in eer en deugd, volgt mijne lessen en mijne voorbeelden en bidt voor mij. BEMINDE NAASTBESTAANDEN, bewijst mij voort uwe liefde met voor mij te bidden, Gij vooral mijn Eerw. Schoonbroeder, gedenk mij aan het altaar des Heeren.

GEBED:

Wij bidden U God, dat hij, die als goede en getrouwe dienaar waakte en wachtte op de komst zijns Meesters (adventsdag waar hij stierf) en onverwachts, maar niet onbereid tot U geroepen werd, terwijl wij met vreugde den Verlosser (op Kerstdag) verwachtten, den Heer als Rechter met gerustheid moge zien komen: door Christus onzen Heer. "Net als Jezus' hart, staat het hart van de priester open voor de wereld.
Het hart van de priester is een beker vol medelijden, een kelk van liefde.
Het hart van de priester is de ontmoetingsplaats van menselijke en goddelijke liefde.
De priester is een man die zich tot doel stelt een andere Christus te zijn, die leeft om te dienen.
Een priester is een gekruisigd man om zo omhoog geheven, ook allen tot Christus te trekken."
(Catherine Doherty)

Dit hooggestemde ideaal, die verheven roeping heeft priester Forrez voor ogen gehouden tijdens zijn lange loopbaan. Hij zou het eenvoudiger gezegd hebben, in bescheidener termen, maar even gemeend.
Hij was een gegeven man, gewetensvol en nauwgezet, man van het volk maar evenzeer man van God, thuis bij de mensen maar ook thuis in de kerk. Hij bracht God bij de mensen en de mensen bij God, verbindingsman tussen twee werelden, bewust van zijn beperktheid, maar steunend op de genade van zijn priesterwijding. Hij wilde een geschikt instrument in de handen van God zijn, meer niet, een dienaar, een vriend, een begrijpend en geduldig priester, maar vol inzet; zolang hij kon wilde hij ten dienste staan.

Met de oude Simeon mag hij nu bidden: laat uw dienaar, Heer, nu naar uw woord in vrede gaan, mijn opdracht is volbracht; ik ga de Heer tegemoet om altijd bij Hem te zijn.

Aan de vele goede mensen die mij omringden in het rustoord Cassiers, speciaal aan mijn huishoudster Louise, mijn gemeende dank. God zal het u lonen.

Onze Lieve Vrouw van Lourdes, bid voor ons.

45.3 The Marriage of Michel Declercq & Irma Lesage

In Figure 45.63, the wedding of Michel Declercq and Irma Lesage at Beselare in 1932 was quite remarkable for several reasons. Irma Lesage was the youngest daughter in a large family. Her parents were Emile Lesage and Eudoxie Lammens, and they lived in Beselare. Eudoxie had died shortly before the wedding. In Chapter 64.6, the reader finds information about their whereabouts before WWI, during, and after.

Beselare was located in the ruined area of Belgium and was under reconstruction in the 1920s and 1930s. Besides the visibility of military cemeteries, hardly anything noticeable anymore reminds us of WWI. However, until the 1980s, the area was still somewhat 'backward' compared to other regions. In the 1920s, when Michel Declercq engaged with Irma Lesage, the area was still devastated. Emile Lesage was a wealthy farmer, blood-related to the de Patin family, continually investing. In particular, he entrusted his children with financial support and finding suitable partners, and he considered Michel Declercq the bull's eye. Emile strongly supported his daughter's wedding with Michel. Since their WWI encounter and flax trade, Emile knew Ernest Constant Declercq (DC14), Michel's father.

The Declercqs in Wielsbeke found the Lesages equally first-class marriage partners because they were traditionally Christian and wealthy farmers. They supported the engagement of Michel and Irma, Valentine, and Daniel. In addition to the common WWI experience, the Lesages were acquainted with writer Edouard Vermeulen. Michel Declercq and his siblings, all interested in culture and reading, must have deemed this very important. During a visit to the Lesage farm, Irma Lesage fell in love with Michel, which must have been around 1927. The couple would ultimately marry in 1932 and live in Wielsbeke until 1936.

Michel Declercq was a handsome, distinguished gentleman. He was educated and cultivated and offered Irma Lesage an opportunity to leave the devastated area of Beselare to live with a flax merchant in the flourishing area near the Leie River. Irma Lesage was equally in a solid situation because she descended from the noble family of 'de Patin.' Furthermore, two brothers had been distinguished soldiers killed during WWI; one was buried at the famous cemetery of Père Lachaise in Paris inside the Monument of the Belgian Soldiers.

Emile Lesage was so pleased with his daughter marrying Michel Declercq that he gave her a considerable dowry. Around 65 thousand Belgian Francs in today's currency (2021), about 1.6 million euros, were adequate to buy a sizeable farm or four beautiful homes at that time. A devaluation by 25% occurred in 1935, which forced them to invest money in the flax business, increase their capital, and then buy a farm, as described in Chapter 45.4 and Chapter 45.5. The newly married couple is shown in Figure 45.64.

45.4 The Honeymoon Years in Wielsbeke

Irma Lesage would have preferred to live alone with her husband after a few years of marriage. Instead, they were forced to reside longer in Wielsbeke in the Declercq - Devenyn family, trying to augment money through investments after the devaluation of the Belgian currency of 1935. Their objective was to buy a farm for themselves, just as they had planned when they married.

Instead, they entered a negative spiral and invested more money in Michel's siblings' education than in their future.

Michel's sisters considered Irma one of them, which also had negative consequences, such as a lack of freedom and the expectation that she had no life of her own.

In 1936, they finally realized that gaining back all their money would not be a tangent target for the near future and decided to move to Deerlijk. A representative photo of this period is shown in Figure 45.65.

They genuinely made financial investments with the best intentions, including the preservation of the family's connection to Ostend, where our ancestor Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) had died in 1604, as seen in Figure 45.66.

After Michel and Irma had relocated to Deerlijk, they preserved close contact with the other Declercqs, as shown in tokens, in Figures 45.67 and 45.68, from the famous Steeple Chase horse race in Waregem where horses hop over the Gaverbeek Creek - once the water supply in the lives of Jeroni Joan Desclergue y Cortés (DC05) and his son Antoni Desclergue (DC06) in the 1600s.

45.5 The Rugged WWII Years in Deerlijk

The Declercq-Lesage family moved from Wielsbeke to Deerlijk in 1936.

When describing the marriage of Michel Declercq and Irma Lesage in 1932, we mentioned that Emile Lesage had been so happy that he gave 65000 Belgian Francs to the couple[9], which was sufficient to purchase a sizable farm and commence a good life. The couple hesitated to invest in a novel farm, and in 1935, the Belgian frank devaluated by 25%. Hoping for better times and flourishing in the flax business, they invested in flax and postponed real estate matters. Meanwhile, they rented a home in Deerlijk from 1936 onward. The 1930s were difficult years because of the global financial crisis after the collapse of the American economy. The crisis impacted the flax business as well.

Financially, the Declercqs suffered while the family expanded, and the sisters of Michel had to continue their (expensive) education. The reduction of their capital and the desire to save money for better times formed significant constraints even before, suddenly, WWII started, shortly after they had moved to Deerlijk, shown in Figure 45.69.

This period, just before the war, is described in Chapter 46, about Maurice Declercq, because, although Maurice was not yet born, events have taken place that caused ripples for many years, even to the yet-to-be conceived children and grandchildren. During the war, Michel refused to contribute to the economy dominated by the German occupiers, and therefore, the family financially hibernated 'for as long as necessary.' The war lasted four years, while more children were born.

Too proud to ask for help, the family has gone through dark times; the children have even suffered from famine. Suppliers of food and clothes were father and son Vangheluwe (described in Chapter 48.10), who traded goods on the black market and were entangled with the resistance during the war. They had known the Declercq-Lesage family in Wielsbeke and now lived nearby in Deerlijk. Sympathy for the family drove the Vangheluwes to leave many more supplies for the Declercqs than they paid for. Had Michel known, he would have refused. However, he never realized he was purchasing food below the market price. The friendship between the two families would last for a long time, resulting in Michel's son Maurice marrying Rene's daughter Nelly, the author's parents, described in Chapter 46.

The difficult times during the war have left a mark on the children. It has caused frustration, humiliation, and internal competition on the one hand and an unbreakable sense of belonging together on the other hand. These contradictions have caused complexities in the future relationship between the children and their marriages. The family is shown in Figure 45.70 at their farm after WWII. Despite their difficulties at that time, Michel Declercq (DC15), who made well-determined plans for the near future, looked like a very proud man, happy for having a large family, having survived the war, and looking forward to a bright future with renewed energy and hope. In Figure 45.72, we present Michel and Irma in 1945 on the occasion of the confirmation of their eldest daughter, Agnes.

[9] his corresponds to 1.6 million euro in 2021

Michel Declercq missed the golden resurrection of flax in 1950-1953 during the Korean War. He had switched to other activities before that and had invested his money in a new home just before 1950. It must have hurt deeply to observe that the price of 1 kg of flax fibers was as high as one square meter of land while unable to participate. Nevertheless, many investors overestimated the future and overinvested in flax. A new crisis followed quickly, during which the price of flax dropped tremendously because of French protectionism. It was the time when most entrepreneurs switched to other businesses. The establishment of numerous small companies in Kortrijk and the Leie is why this area, in the 1960s, was called 'Texas of Flanders.'

It is said that Michel Declercq (DC15) was very supportive of King Leopold III of Belgium, in Figures 45.73 and 45.74. Michel was very catholic and detested communism on the one hand and atheist liberalism on the other. He wanted the King to return and continue his duty after the war.

45.6 A new life at Sint Lodewijk in Deerlijk

After the war, the family revived and constructed their own Casal dels Desclergue in Deerlijk in Figures 45.75 and 45.76. This was possible thanks to the money they had saved and because they were paid back a large part of the money they had invested in Michel's siblings when the parents sold the farm at Wielsbeke.

As Michel had given up farming and the flax business during the war, a farm was no longer necessary. Therefore, a decent home that could house a family with nine children was everything they needed.

At that time, the new home in Oude Heerweg at Saint Louis in Deerlijk was the most beautiful in the area[10].

The family found happiness again after the devastation of the war. Unfortunately, Irma Lesage died in 1953. Michel, shown around 1953 in Figure 45.77, would die ten years later in 1963.

Michel and Irma had acquired the land on which the house was constructed from Georges Ameye and Maria Decock[11]; their tombstone and obituary are shown in Figure 45.78.

45.7 Michel Declercq the Widower

A photo of Michel Declercq, taken shortly before or soon after the death of his wife Irma in 1953, is shown in Figure 45.77. The loss of Irma was devastating for Michel, yet he was not a man to succumb to despair. With unwavering resilience, he continued to invest in and plan for his children's futures. While not every child would follow in their footsteps, this was a reflection of their own choices and characters, not a failure on their father's part. Michel's moral compass remained steady, guiding him toward a life marked by prosperity and high ethical standards.

As a widower, he found solace and pleasure in tending to his garden, visiting farmers (as seen in Figure 45.79), racing pigeons, and reading.

Michel is deeply connected with the plant Sedum Spurium, also known as vetkruid or kruipers in English as stonecrops. These resilient plants, which grow on rocks and in thorny soil, were moved by Michel from his farm in Wielsbeke to his home in Deerlijk and finally to his new home in Sint Lodewijk in Deerlijk. After passing, his children took shoots from these plants and planted them in their gardens. This tradition has become a form of identity for the Declercq family: a home is not truly a Declercq home without Sedum Spurium. Even the author maintains this tradition, as illustrated in Figure 45.80, with plants that trace their lineage back to Wielsbeke.

Michel's love for farming and animals was a lifelong passion. He cultivated crops in his garden and raised racing pigeons as a hobby, a pastime shared by the author in his youth, depicted in Figure 45.82.

After Irma's death, Michel confronted his mortality and decided to create wooden crosses for each of his children, adorning them with baroque figurines of Jesus. While he purchased the figurines, the crosses themselves were handmade, similar to the one shown in Figure 45.81.

Michel remained in good health until 1959, as seen in Figure 45.83. The Declercq home was spacious and beautiful, though contemporary standards defined comfort. A single large stove heated the entire downstairs, leaving the upstairs bedrooms chilly and the attic room freezing in winter. Nonetheless, Michel chose the attic for himself, ensuring his children had the most comfortable rooms.

A devout Catholic, Michel remained steadfast in his faith until he died in 1963.

Anecdotes abound of him refusing to converse with those who worked on Sundays. He spent his free time working in his garden or visiting friends and family, and his expertise and knowledge made him a respected figure in his community. Michel's proficiency in farming, particularly flax, and his technical education made him a valued guest and advisor.

Had Michel lived longer, his positive influence on his descendants would undoubtedly have been significant. His wisdom and guidance would have been a cherished legacy for his children and grandchildren, providing counsel on life, morality, education, farming, industry, and more. In his absence, his DNA lives on in his descendants, a testament to the enduring impact of his life. Whether or not there is life after death, the legacy Michel left behind is cherished and respected, symbolized in Figure 45.84.

Life in the Declercq household, with nine children, was often hectic. When disputes arose at the dinner table, Michel would take his dish outside, finding peace in the embrace of nature, enjoying the sunshine or the song of a bird. He loved to nap in the shade of his crops on summer days, particularly his princess beans, which provided him comfort and tranquility, particularly when he fell ill around 1960. During these times, he likely reflected on his life, his beloved wife, missed opportunities, and his family's future. Visits to his mother, who outlived him, may have offered him solace.

Michel's health deteriorated rapidly due to an infection affecting his aortic valve, possibly caused by Lyme disease. He experienced shortness of breath and swollen feet, and he passed away on August 2, 1963, at 10 a.m., at the age of 57. His final years were marked by a rapid decline in health, as evident in Figure 45.83. There are indications from family accounts that Michel died a disappointed man, having had little opportunity to share his life stories and family history with his children, resulting in their limited interest in their heritage.

However, connections with their mother's family, mainly through Daniel Lesage, remained strong. The author hopes this book will honor Michel's legacy and the entire family's history, reversing the tide of forgetfulness. Michel's brother-in-law, Amandine Lesage's husband, also passed away in 1963, as mentioned in Chapter 64.7.4.

45.8 The Family Tomb

The new tomb is shown in Chapter 64.7.10. When Irma Lesage passed away, she was not interred in a stone tomb but instead buried in the ground with a wooden cross marking her grave. The family initially planned to purchase a beautiful tombstone for her. However, as time passed and the children became preoccupied with their own lives and worries, Michel's illness further diverted their attention. When Michel passed away in 1963, the children decided it was time to honor their parents properly. They resolved to rebury Irma in a stone tomb alongside Michel and to provide a dignified tombstone for both parents.

Unfortunately, the task was not carried out as intended. The hired contractor failed to fulfill their duties appropriately. Instead of reinterring Irma, the workers placed a concrete box in which Michel was buried on top of her remains. This situation was highly disrespectful to their mother. It is assumed that the children were unaware of this and were betrayed by the company they entrusted with this significant task. When the author's father died in 2015, the grandparents were exhumed and reburied in a new family grave, as shown in Chapter 64.7.10. It was during this process that the misfortune was discovered and rectified. Additionally, Michel had been buried with his feet pointing north, while the grave was oriented south. According to Catholic tradition, it is preferable to be buried with feet pointing east or south, but never north, especially when the tomb is oriented feet south and head north.

Therefore, Michel's burial was not only disrespectful but also contrary to his religious beliefs. The error was corrected with a dignified reburial in 2015, ensuring Michel and Irma could rest together as they wished. The author, their grandson, performed this sacred act of exhumation and reburial. The new family grave, depicted in Chapter 64.7.10, is intended for three generations of Declercqs, including the author.

When the original grave's 50-year concession expired in 2013, Maurice Declercq (DC16) ensured its prolongation. Maurice took care of the family's administrative legacy, as evidenced by the death certificate of Michel Declercq in Figure 45.6 on page 806.

He made sure that the grave of Michel and Irma Declercq-Lesage would not be emptied and destroyed, as evidenced in Figure 45.86. However, the old tomb had become heavily damaged, with a significant crack in the erected stone, posing a danger to surrounding graves. For this reason, to honor the grandparents, they were reburied in 2015 in a larger family grave, shown in Figure 64.180 on page 1274, located 20 meters northeast of the original tomb. The new mausoleum ensures their remembrance will be preserved for many decades. Maurice is being buried in the same family grave as his parents, a favor he owes.

The ground where the original grave was located was preserved and used in 2018 for the burial of Agnes Declercq, Michel, and Irma's eldest and unmarried daughter. Agnes had expressed her wish to be buried in her parents' tomb. Her burial was arranged by the children of Maria Declercq, who were closely connected to her. Nearby is also the grave of Marcel Declercq, which is maintained by his daughter Carole.

Michel Declercq's house did not remain in the family and was sold once all the children had reached adulthood and chosen separate life paths.

45.9 Additional Acquaintances of the Family

Throughout this chapter, we have mentioned several acquaintances of the family. Here, we highlight the family of Dr Philip Monbaliu, shown in Figure 45.87. Reference to them is also made in Chapter 44.8.22, Chapter 46.2.6, and also Figure 46.9. Dr Philip Monbaliu was born in Lissewege on April 13, 1895, and died in Deerlijk on June 15, 1999. He was a farmer's son, which made Michel Declercq choose him as a family doctor at Deerlijk. During WWI, the doctor accomplished all his consultations on a bicycle. He often trotted 20 km a day. There was no phone at that time, except at some fixed locations. So, he always left a consultation round planning of the day with his wife. By doing so, she could have someone intercept him on his round in case of an emergency.

Pharmacists did not exist, so the doctor had a pharmacy where his wife mixed the necessary powders and syrups in his house.

The author often saw the ancient doctor in his beautiful home at the corner of the streets, 'Kapel-ter-Rustestraat' and 'Stationsstraat' while reading or walking in the garden. He never spoke to him but remembered a radio interview when he was over 100. "God heeft mij vergeten," he said in amazement.

Many people in Deerlijk have been born by Dr Monbaliu. Many souls were saved thanks to the ingenuity of the doctor and his very primitive tools.

He had passed his military service, son of farmers Ernest Constant Declercq and Marie Elodie Devenyn, from Wielsbeke, present and approving the marriage. The bride was living in Beselare and born in Moorslede on February 20, 1905, daughter of farmer Emile Theophile Lesage, present and approving the marriage, and Eudoxie Romanie Lammens, who passed away on May 5, 1931. The witnesses were 29-year-old farmer Joseph Declercq, brother of Michel who lived in Wielsbeke, and 35-year-old farmer Gerard Lesage, brother of Irma, who lived in Passchendaele.*

LE ROI LÉOPOLD III

PRINCE DE BELGIQUE

né à Bruxelles le 3 novembre 1901

Je me donne tout entier à la Belgique.
(Léopold III.
Discours du Trône 23 février 1934.)

La première récompense du devoir accompli, c'est de l'avoir bien fait.
(Albert I.)

Je crois que lorsque deux routes s'ouvrent devant nous, celle du devoir est toujours la plus dure. C'est celle-là que j'ai choisie.
(Léopold III.
Wijnendaele à l'aube du 25 mai 1940.)

Les richesses que Dieu avait déposées dans son cœur : un sens aigu de ses responsabilités, une droiture et un courage dans l'accomplissement de sa mission, mais aussi un grand amour de l'âme profonde du peuple et des gens simples.

Tous ceux qui l'ont approché ont vu sa grande sérénité, sa paix et son courage. C'était l'amour pour son pays et la fidélité à la parole donnée qui le prédisposèrent à tant d'abnégation, de dignité et de réserve.
(Cardinal G. Danneels, aux funérailles.)

Il trouva le bonheur dans l'amour des siens et son union intime avec la nature.

Ge zijt bedankt.
En kom wel thuis.
Zo dikwijls heeft moeder deze woorden herhaald aan allen die haar een bezoekje hadden gebracht in de kliniek.
In die weinige woorden lag heel haar leven : dankbaarheid en denken aan de anderen.
Ontelbare malen had moeder die zelfde woorden gesproken in de Oude Heerweg 66. Haar huis was de zoete inval, waar haar tweemaal zeven kinderen zo graag kwamen. En de 17 kleinkinderen. En de 23 achterkleinkinderen.
Weer of geen weer, ze waren er altijd welkom : in het putje van de winter - met Kerstmis - en in de hitte van de zomerse dagen - op 14 augustus. En zelden of nooit gingen ze weg met lege handen : een stuk breiwerk, een ovenkoek, een snoepje of wat drinkgeld voor de kleinsten.
Moeder heeft veel gewerkt. Met de glimlach heeft ze harde noten moeten kraken : de zorg voor vader, de aandacht voor de kinderen, de was en de strijk, de boterkarn en de broodoven ... en nog veel meer. Waar zij dan de tijd haalde om nog buitenshuis te gaan werken, dat zal voor altijd wel een onopgelost raadsel blijven.
In stilte heeft moeder ook veel gebeden en als ze een kruiske moest dragen, dan was er niemand die het wist.

Ons moeder kende een rustige, oude dag. Ze leefde nen dag met ne keer : ze had altijd tijd om te luisteren, tijd om mensen te ontvangen, tijd om een kaartje te leggen, tijd voor gezelligheid, tijd voor een bezoekje bij vrienden en geburen.

Moeder had zilveren haren en een hart van goud. Dat beeld van moeder dragen wij mee in ons verder leven, als een kostbaar kleinood, als een dierbare relikwie.

En ook wij zeggen nu in koor : Moeder, ge zijt bedankt.
En kom wel thuis ... bij O. L. Heer.

When the author (President) and Françoise Vanhecke (special guest) appeared together on the stage, it must have put a smile on their grandparents' faces somewhere in Heaven. It was also the birthday of the author's father. It was an event where a few details about the family history were revealed, a peak moment of happiness, but it was sadly followed by the sudden death of the author's father at the end of June. The author was the President of the 2015 ICU Congress and the Steering Committee of the ICU. He welcomed 700 participants from 53 countries; 612 were active participants from ultrasonics, 88 were visitors or accompanying persons, 30% were students. The participants enjoyed 542 presentations during the congress, i.e., 410 oral presentations and more than 170 poster presentations. The event held 67 scientific sessions (spread over 95 periods) with a maximum of 10 parallel sessions. Nine industrial sponsors supported the event. The congress invited nine plenary and keynote speakers. In total, 645 abstracts had been submitted; 89% were of sufficient quality and were accepted for presentation. The event has been the largest and most successful ICU congress ever. For many years, the participants have also mentioned the excellent food provided during the event, prepared by a Master-Chief.*

REINE DES BELGES
née à Stockholm, le 17 novembre 1905, décédée accidentellement à Kussnacht (Suisse) le 29 août 1935

Trois fois Reine ; Elle régna sur le cœur de son royal Époux, de toute la force de son amour ; Elle régna sur le cœur de ses Enfants, par une tendresse sans exemple et un dévouement incomparable ; Elle régna sur le cœur de son Peuple, par sa grâce souriante et son inépuisable charité.

45.11 Their Offspring

As expressed at the beginning of this book, the author has decided to limit the descriptions of cousins, uncles, and aunties, apart from some exceptions. The continuation of the Declercq line is shown in Figure 45.94.

Marcel Declercq, Carol's father, appears in Chapter 46.2.6 and is shown in Figure 19.2 on page 156. We would also like to mention and acknowledge the son Jozef and the daughters, Maria and Agnes, with permission. Indeed, they contributed to this book by sharing photos and information that had not been available to the author earlier. Maria's children are Françoise, Caroline, Ann, Dominique, and Franck, and she raised her granddaughter Angelique on her own. They all expressed genuine interest in the contents of this book.

Agnes' profound religious faith and her lifelong devotion towards her closest family's well-being and many others earn her appearance in this book, in Figure 45.95. Her alternative way of life, devotion to God and humankind, love for simplicity and infinite goodness, daily prayers, and philosophical mind have baffled many of her siblings and frequently resulted in ignorance and exclusion. Her inclusion in this book is the author's statement of appreciation.

Although she had always desired to become a nun, she has chosen an earthly life close to her dearest ones and may be called an exemplary 'sister of the profession.' She had a golden voice inherited from her father, Michel Declercq, and filled churches during masses and prayers like an angel sent from Heaven. She loved reading books on matters close to her heart, such as religion, philosophy, history, and, above all, the life of Saints. Money and possessions were of no interest to her. She hated pride and glorified simplicity. Her tombstone was paid voluntarily by the dearest ones to her and who let their heart speak. As expected, she has spent her entire fortune on charity and left nothing behind. She was a good Christian to the bone. We can cite Luke,[12]

'Do not be afraid, little flock, for it is your father's pleasure to give you the kingdom. Sell your possessions and give alms. Make purses for yourselves that do not wear out, an unfailing treasure in Heaven, where no thief comes near, and no moth destroys. For where your prize is, there your heart will also be.'

Her obituary card and gravestone are also shown in Figure 45.95.

Maria is shown in Figure 45.96. After the death of her husband, Maria raised her five children and later also her granddaughter Angelique. Her strength is remarkable, and her deed is honorable because she neither chose to become a widow nor steal anyone's children. They were a gift from God, and she has cherished them with all her might and love.

46.1 Introduction

Maurice Alois Declercq and Nelly Maria Vangheluwe are the author's parents, and they also appear in the other chapters.

Maurice Declercq appears in Chapter 64 as the son of Irma Helena Lesage; in Chapter 65 as great-great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Adrienne de Patin (DP12); in Chapter 66.1 as great-great-great-great-grandson of Barbara Benoit; in Chapter 66.2 as great-great-great-great-great-grandson of Maria Jeanne Christine Benoit; in Chapter 67 as the son-in-law of Anna Den Dauw; in Chapter 68 as a 't Kint descendant; in Chapter 69 as great-grandson-in-law of Marie Nathalie Surmont; and in Chapter 71 as the great-grandson of Clemens Lammens.

Maurice and Nelly's relationship was rooted in a profound familiarity, having known each other since childhood. Their bond, forged over many years, provided a solid foundation for a marriage that was, by many accounts, remarkable in its strength and mutual affection. However, this foundation had its cracks, primarily due to siblings' pervasive and persistent interference.

Despite the relentless interference from siblings, Maurice and Nelly's resilience shone through. They continually navigated the tumultuous waters of familial involvement, addressing complex challenges at the expense of their own peace and stability. These external pressures, while exacerbating the inherent difficulties of their lives, also showcased their unwavering commitment to each other and their marriage.

The constant presence of siblings in their marital affairs often overshadowed the couple's personal needs and aspirations. The siblings' actions, whether driven by misguided concern or sheer stubbornness, frequently undermined Maurice and Nelly's efforts to carve out their own identity as a family unit. This interference strained their relationship and impeded their ability to fully support each other in the manner they both deserved and desired.

Had Maurice and Nelly been granted the necessary support and respect for their autonomy, their marriage could have soared to even greater heights of happiness and fulfillment. The lack of familial boundaries deprived them of the opportunity to nurture their relationship without the added burden of external conflicts. Their resilience in the face of such adversity is a testament to their deep connection and commitment to one another, leaving us to ponder the potential that was left unfulfilled.

While Maurice and Nelly's marriage was indeed wonderful, it was marred by their siblings' continuous and often intrusive involvement. This amplified their challenges and detracted from their ability to realize their full potential as a couple. Their story underscores the importance of respecting the autonomy of married couples, allowing them the space to build their future free from undue external pressures.

In 1975, the author was born into a family that, despite its challenges, provided an environment rich with love and support. The author can unequivocally affirm that he was fortunate to have exemplary natural parents and also epitomic foster parents, whose detailed accounts are provided in Chapter 69.11. The complexity of his youth, shaped by a blend of nurturing care and occasional familial turbulence, played a pivotal role in molding his character and fostering a deep sense of perseverance.

The author experienced a balance of positive and challenging moments throughout his formative years. The constructive influences of his upbringing significantly outweighed the difficulties, instilling in him resilience and a profound appreciation for the strength of familial bonds.

These early experiences laid the groundwork for a well-rounded diplomatic personality with a persistent drive to overcome obstacles and achieve personal growth.

One of the most transformative periods in the family's journey was marked by the arrival of grandchildren. This new generation brought a renewed sense of unity and purpose to the author's parents, bridging previously insurmountable gaps. The joy and fulfillment derived from their roles as grandparents mitigated the impact of external negativities, fostering a more harmonious family dynamic.

In essence, the author's birth in 1975 marked the beginning of a life enriched by the unwavering support of his parents despite the complexities they faced. The subsequent arrival of grandchildren further solidified these familial bonds, demonstrating the enduring power of love and togetherness in overcoming external adversities.

Indeed, tout est bien qui finit bien.

Unfortunately, the author's father passed away too soon. He had just reached the cream of the pie of his life and could have enjoyed it for a few more years. Sic vita est hominum.

We should always remain grateful that he survived an accident when he was a soldier and received a 55-year extended life span to establish a life and family. It was a satisfying experience to find the name Maurice Declercq in the Spanish archives of our ancestors in Figure 46.1.

Nelly Maria Vangheluwe, the author's mother, was a woman of many talents. She was always self-employed, a testament to her entrepreneurial spirit. Her love for people was evident in her enjoyment of their company. The spirit of trade and merchandising, a part of her family's heritage, ran deep in her veins.

Figure 46.1: *This is a fragment of 'Arbre genealògic del llinatge Desclergue i el seu entroncament amb els Pedrolo.' It is shown here because it indicates that our ancestors had already used the name Maurice Declercq, namely 'Mauricio Desclergue.' The fragment shows the bloodline from Pere Desclergue (DC01) to Isabel Desclergue, who married Jacint de Pedrolo. We can see two sons of Pere Desclergue, namely Galceran (DC02d) and Joan Berenguer (DC02). The latter person's son, Bonaventura (I) (DC03), is shown, but his wife, Maria Ana Cortés de Monroy, is ignored. Two sons are shown, namely Mauricio Desclergue (DC04e) and Bonaventura Desclergue (II) (DC04). The latter married Elisabeth Anna de Ratera, from whom Francesc (DC05e), Antoni (DC05b), and Francisca (DC05d) were born. Later, Maria Anna Desclergue y Villavicencio gave birth to Enric (DC05c) and Jeroni (DC05). The tree only focuses on Francesc (DC05e), the ancestor of Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue. Therefore, it continues with the couple Francesc (DC05e) and Catarina Tous y Monserrat, from whom two children stem, namely Isabel Dessclergue (DC05ex1) and Amadeo Francesc Desclergue (DC05ey1). Isabel married Jacint de Pedrolo, and they were the parents of Francesc de Pedrolo y Desclergue. 46.2.1 Introduction, his Birth and Death

The most recent ancestors of Maurice Declercq, shown in Figure 46.4, can be found in Figure 46.2. His birth is presented in Figure 46.3. Introducing a dear person and his passing away in recent times, shown in Figures 46.5, 46.6, and 46.7, is not an easy task. Therefore, we may ask what Maurice would have suggested writing about him as a brief introduction.

He was a professional engineer but always wanted to be a farmer, and he was the heir of his godfather and uncle, Daniel Lesage. He grew up with his parents in Deerlijk, his uncle Daniel Lesage, and his aunt Magdalena Meersseman in Moorslede. He lost his mother when he was twelve and his father when he was twenty-two. He loved helping others by all means possible and had one child, the author. He cheered up and became confident and satisfied once he had grandchildren.

According to medical analysis, Maurice Declercq died in 2015 of an aortic rupture, likely induced by a chronic aortic aneurism initiated many years earlier by the scooter accident described in Chapter 46.2.6, which had also ruptured his liver[1]. The hypothesis is that the problem has led to a dangerous situation due to an age-related rise in blood pressure in addition to stress caused by his siblings. This stress caused not only a rise in blood pressure but also migraine, for which he has been injected with triptan regularly, worsening the situation even more. In addition, robbers had entered his home a few months before his death, whence he could no longer sleep peacefully and became exhausted. A thorough medical check[2], for instance, would likely have revealed the problem and allowed Maurice to have turned 90 and still enjoy his life and grandchildren.

Pointing fingers at others would not bring him back, whence the author decided in 2015 to accept his faith. A Declercq, however, remembers.

The author's father passed away with a clear conscience, having led a prosperous life devoted primarily to the well-being of others. He excelled as a son, parent, brother, uncle, neighbor, friend, and acquaintance, leaving a lasting impact on all who knew him. His dedication to these relationships and his unwavering support for those around him were exemplary.

However, in his selflessness and commitment to serving others, he often neglected his own needs and personal enjoyment. While his life was marked by a profound sense of duty and care for his loved ones and community, he sacrificed his own pleasures and opportunities for self-care.

Despite this, his legacy is one of remarkable kindness, generosity, and devotion, embodying the highest ideals of familial and social responsibility.

Maurice Alois Declercq (DC16) was born on May 11, 1941, in Deerlijk. He was a son of Michel Achiel Renatus Declercq (DC15) and Irma Helena Lesage. The Germans occupied Deerlijk then, and his parents went through a challenging period described in Chapter 45.5. These difficult times taught Maurice to respect his elder siblings and show responsibility to his younger ones. This sense of duty was later strengthened by his mother's death and cost more energy during his entire life than what may reasonably be expected of a brother.

He was named after the husband, Maurice Wullaert, of his godmother, Rachelle Declercq, described in Chapter 44.5.6. He received his second name from the father-in-law, Aloïs Xavier Meersseman, of his godfather, Daniel Lesage, described in Chapter 64.7.12. Aloïs Xavier Meersseman was born at Oostnieuwkerke in 1849 and was Maria Pahrailde Vercruysse's husband, born at Moorslede in 1860.

[1] A comparison with the medical literature indeed confirms such a hypothesis. The National Library of Medicine has published several articles on this matter. Examples include 'Traumatic aortic arch false aneurysm after blunt chest trauma in a motocross rider,' J Cardiothorac Surg. 2008 May 1;3:23. 'A case of a chronic traumatic thoracic aneurysm after an injury 18 years ago,' Nihon Kyobu Geka Gakkai Zasshi. 1994 Nov;42(11):2102-5. 'Thoracic aortic aneurysms after blunt trauma,' Ulus Travma Acil Cerrahi Derg. 2013 Jul;19(4):343-7.

Heer
Maurice Alois Declercq

geboren te Deerlijk op 11 mei 1941 en godvruchtig overleden te Gent op 23 juni 2015, zoon van (†) Heer Michel A. R. Declercq en

van (†) Mevrouw Irma H. Lesage, petekind van (†) Heer Daniel Lesage en van (†) Mevrouw Rachel Declercq.

Een man is plots van ons heengegaan wiens gedachtenis in hoge eer zal blijven bij allen die hem kenden. Vol van zachtmoedigheid en goedheid, aangenaam in zijn woorden, onberispelijk van inborst, wist hij de genegenheid van allen te winnen en niemand sprak van hem een woord kwaad. Als een rots in de branding was hij voor velen een steunverlaat. Behulpzaamheid droeg hij heel hoog in het vaandel. Hij hield er een sobere levensstijl op na en vond geluk in het gelukkig maken van anderen. Berekend en ver vooruitziend plande hij zijn dagen, weken, maanden en jaren, hij zaaide en droeg zorg voor zijn gewassen, ... het geluk oogstte hij overvloedig doch in alle bescheidenheid en sereniteit in de herfst van zijn leven.

Vaarwel mijn dierbare nakomelingen, bloedverwanten en vrienden, ween niet zoals zij die geen hoop hebben; wij zullen elkander wederzien; wees bereid, want gij weet noch dag noch uur. Que la volonté du Seigneur se fasse.

Lieve kleinkinderen, het bloed kruipt waar het niet gaan kan, wees flink en rechtschapen, doe uw best, heb steeds vertrouwen en word wie u bent - u bent mijn leven - steeds blijf ik u gadeslaan en wanneer het eens moeilijk gaat, werp dan een blik naast u en u zult me aan uw zijde zien staan, ik weet de weg want ik ben u voorgegaan.

Figure 46.8: Venerable Gnanissara Murungagasyaye was born on April 24, 1946, in Hambantota, Sri Lanka, and died on November 5, 2021. He was a personal friend of Sri Lanka's Presidents Mahinda and Gotabaya Rajapaksa and a respected representative of the Buddhist community at the United Nations and Europe. Mahinda Rajapakse was President from 2005 to 2015, following Chandrika Kumaratunga Bandaranaike, while Gotabaya Rajapaksa has been President since 2019, following Maithripala Sirisena. Venerable Gnanissara Murungagasyaye was originally from the South of Sri Lanka, and he did his Dhamma studies at a school for Vidyodaya Pirivma monks in Colombo and then began his university studies at the University of Peradeniya. Consequently, he became a teacher of Buddhism for about ten years in a school designed to train monks. Venerable Gnanissara came to France at Venerable Chandaratana's invitation in 1985. The latter helped him find accommodation in the Vietnamese temple of Blanc Mesnil under the patronage of Venerable Kim Ban. He notably studied French and Philosophy at the University of Paris VIII. He became the President of the Vietnamese Theravada Buddhist Association until his death. He continued his life as a monk with seriousness and honesty for many years, attending to the religious activities of the Buddhist communities established in France and Sri Lanka. In particular, he gave numerous scholarships and much more to underprivileged schoolchildren and university students. He built houses for low-income families in Sri Lanka. He also had a hospital built near his native village. This building had around 40 beds and all the necessary medical equipment. On Sunday, November 7, 2021, he was cremated in his native village in the presence of Sri Lanka's President and numerous high-placed officials and scholars. He has visited the author's family more than once. Three months after the death of the author's father, Maurice Declercq, in 2015, Venerable Gnanissara Murungagasyaye led a Buddhist commemorative ceremony at the author's home in Kortrijk and that of his father in Deerlijk. When he woke up before the ceremony, Venerable Gnanissara Murungagasyaye said that the quietness and beautiful farmland view reminded him of his home in Sri Lanka and made him very happy. His visit has been a blessing for the family and friends and has always been appreciated. The top-left five images depict the life and death of the monk, while the other photos were taken on September 26, 2015, at the commemoration of the author's father.

Figure 46.20: 1961, June 19, a letter of Maurice Declercq from Westhoven to his father in Deerlijk. It states (in old-fashioned Dutch): 'Father, in this way, I let you know that I am still in prosperous health. Of course, I hope so for all of you too. I have read your letter carefully and with the most significant interest. Father, there is a lot of truth in your message. Nevertheless, I am a soldier, and I am not at home. Besides, there is not much I can say about it, can I?' . The letter exposed the close bond between Michel and his son Maurice. (Declercq de Silva Archive)

Daniel Lesage's wife was Magdalena Meersseman. Daniel and Magdalena had no children and fostered Maurice the best they could as if he were their son. Consequently, they also thought of the author as their Grandson. The feelings were mutual.

Maurice Declercq was a professional engineer. He served in the Belgian Army Corps of Engineers in Germany, mainly at Cassel and Vogelsang, in the 1950s.

He was a man of few words but a person of significant deeds. His actions consistently spoke louder than any words could, embodying a quiet strength and unwavering commitment to those he cared for. The author sees a reflection of his father's life and character in Juan Carlos de Borbón y Battenberg, Count of Barcelona (1913-1993), albeit at a different level and in varied circumstances. Both men exemplified a life of duty and dedication, leaving indelible marks on their respective spheres through their steadfast and noble deeds.

46.2.2 Spring: his Early life

As explained in the introduction, Maurice was born at his parents' farm near the train station during the war. The doctor who delivered him was Dr Philip Monbaliu, described in Chapter 45.9, who lived 2 km away. Memorabilia are shown in Figure 46.9.

The family had trusted this doctor for several years, mainly because they lived nearby for a while just before the war in a rental home somewhere in Braamakerstraat near the chapel Kapel-ter-Ruste, built in collaboration with our ancestors and extensively described in Chapter 49.

Because Maurice's parents had virtually no income before and during the war, and with their investments frozen[3], they were unable to pay the rent and pleaded with the landlord for patience. The landlord, however, remained implacable and ultimately evicted them from their home.

Although Maurice's father, Michel Declercq, knew their family was not destitute, this event was profoundly traumatic for the children. Maurice's mother, Irma Lesage, was devastated by the ordeal. This eviction inflicted deep humiliation and frustration upon the family, especially given their young children and shaped their character profoundly.

The psychological impact of this event was profound and far-reaching. The trauma experienced by Maurice's family not only affected the immediate members but was also transmitted to future generations, including Maurice himself. The events before his birth indelibly shaped his worldview and perception of society. This inherited memory resulted in pervasive insecurity throughout Maurice's life and was even indeliberately transmitted to his son without ever mentioning the facts.

The enduring humiliation from the eviction left indelible scars on the family's collective psyche. For Maurice, it fostered a persistent feeling of inferiority and, simultaneously, a profound sense of interdependence with his siblings. This interdependence, while offering emotional support, also imposed a significant burden on his marriage. The notion of inferiority was deeply ingrained and eroded only gradually over time.

Maurice's journey towards finding peace was long and arduous. It was only through the academic success of his son, who became a university professor, and the joy of having grandchildren that Maurice finally found a sense of fulfillment and tranquility.

This ultimate reconciliation highlights the potential for intergenerational healing and the profound impact of educational and familial achievements on psychological well-being.

After their Braamakerstraat experience, the family moved to a farm near the train station in Deerlijk, where Maurice was born.

WWII continued to cause difficulties until 1944. They received support through merchandise they could buy below the market price thanks to the goodwill of René Vangheluwe, described in Part X, who would much later become the father-in-law of Maurice Declercq. René appreciated the family because he knew them when they lived in Wielsbeke and understood the difficulties they faced in having so many children during the dark years of WWII.

After the war, the situation improved quickly. Michel received due money, could be economically active, and finally was paid back the money he had spent before and during the war for his sisters’ education. As a result, they constructed a beautiful home in Oude Heerweg, Sint Lodewijk, Deerlijk, shown in Figure 45.75 on page 841. The house provided new oxygen to the nine children and offered Michel and Irma a sense of pride and worth. Interestingly, René Vangheluwe also constructed a home in the same area in 1955. In other words, the seeds were sown that would result in a marriage between the author’s parents.

Sweet memories of Maurice’s youth are shared in Figures 46.10, 46.11, 46.4, and 46.12.

46.2.3 The Death of his Mother

On March 22, 1953, Maurice celebrated his confession warmly embraced by his parents, godfather Daniel Lesage, and godmother Rachelle Declercq. The family was happy. They had lived in their new home in Sint Lodewijk, Deerlijk, for several years. They had gained prosperity, and everything went well.

Nobody would have expected the disaster that would follow. His confession token in Figure 46.13 contains words that are so meaningful in the light of his past and the time yet to come,

’Ik wilde als een vogel zijn, een leeuwerik in de lucht, en klimmen naar het groot festijn in blanke blauwe vlucht.’

The word ’wilde’ then had two meanings, i.e., ’wanted’ and ’would like to.’ Looking back at it in the following years, he probably interpreted the word by its first meaning and looked back with enormous nostalgia.

In the late Spring of 1953, Irma Lesage, mother of Maurice, became slightly ill. She had digestive problems and pain, which worsened. The diagnosis was a volvulus. This medical problem sometimes goes away, but it requires rest and, if possible, proper medical treatment. Being a mother of nine children, Irma felt she was too busy with her household to go to the hospital and undergo surgery when it worsened.

She ultimately had complications that caused an intestinal perforation. She was urged to the Hospital of Kortrijk immediately and had surgery, but it was too late. The surgeon was Dr. André Baekelandt, brother of Leon Baekelandt, a flax merchant from Gullegem and acquaintance of Michel Declercq. Irma was already poisoned and died the next day, on June 7, 1953.

Before she died, she asked Maurice to look after his siblings, a task he fulfilled until he died in 2015, when the request’s intended expiry date had already passed 50 years or so.

Her death was a shock to the entire village. Everyone knew Irma as a sweet, decent mother who had gone through difficult times and found new happiness in Saint Louis, Deerlijk. To Michel Declercq, this was a fatal disaster. Not only had he lost his beloved wife, but her death also left him with nine growing children.

When Maurice, as an older man, looked at his picture in Figure 46.14, tears always appeared because of the reminder of his mother and his suffering afterward.

After his mother’s death, when Maurice was not in Moorslede, he found comfort with farmer Albert Buysschaert, shown in Figure 46.15, and his wife, Marguerite Vandendriessche, in Groenstraat in Sint Lodewijk Deerlijk. Indeed, it was somewhat too crowded at home with so many children, and Maurice was cozier with the Buysschaert family. He would visit them until the end and see them with the author when he was still a child. Albert was a fine and honest man with significant knowledge about farming, real estate, and much more. The Buysschaert family is buried a few meters from the Declercq de Silva tomb. Their distant relatives, Geert Buysschaert and Rosalie Buysschaert, are, respectively, the author’s former dentist and current family physician.

Maurice’s profound sense of responsibility towards his siblings shaped much of his emotional landscape throughout his life. This unwavering trust and belief in his siblings persisted even in the face of clear signs that they might not always be honest with him or exploit his confidence.

Maurice’s commitment to his family remained steadfast despite these potential betrayals and the emotional torment he often endured.

The tumultuous environment of a large family, with numerous siblings under one roof, contributed to Maurice’s aversion to chaos and his longing for a more serene and intimate family setting. This experience profoundly influenced his decision to have only one child later.

Figure 46.25: 2019, the death announcement of Dr Guido Baekelandt, the hero who saved the life of Maurice Declercq in 1961. The author would never have existed if Dr Baekeland had not been there. Eternal gratitude is in place; hence, here is a copy of this announcement. Dr Baekelandt was rightfully blessed with a rich and meaningful life that lasted 88 years. The accurate measure of a doctor's success lies in their technical proficiency and unwavering dedication to preserving life and fostering the bonds that define our humanity. A real doctor does not steal a son but returns him to the father. Through such dedication, a genuine doctor like Dr. Bakelandt exemplifies the highest virtues of the medical profession, achieving the profound and honorable distinction of 'summa cum laude' in the art of healing.

Maurice's preference for smaller, more peaceful family dynamics was a deliberate effort to create the stable and calm environment he had always yearned for.

Maurice found solace and a sense of true belonging in the company of families that epitomized the tranquility he desired. Notably, the Buysschaert family and his godfather, Daniel Lesage, gave him the peace and quietness he craved. In their company, Maurice experienced a genuine sense of home, where he could find respite from the emotional upheaval that often characterized his interactions with his siblings.

His life and character accentuate the interplay between Maurice's early familial experiences and later life choices. His constant quest for emotional stability and his selective trust in certain family members reflect the profound psychological impact of his upbringing. Maurice's life story reveals the enduring influence of childhood environments on adult relationships and personal well-being, offering valuable insights into psychology and social sciences for those interested in these fields.

46.2.4 A Period when he was Temporary Bedridden

Around 1955, 2 years after his mother's death, Maurice was diagnosed with a Femoroacetabular impingement, which required surgery and rest in bed for a couple of months. Although Maurice has never felt any discomfort in his entire life because of it, the fact that he had had to stay in bed for so long was a painful memory. Indeed, he was a very active person. Having to remain in bed for so long must have been very frustrating.

He often told how he could hear his siblings playing outside while lasting helplessly in his room.

René Vangheluwe and Anna Den Dauw moved to their new house near the Declercqs during these months. The author's mother still remembers visiting the author's father to offer him some comfort. Image 46.16 shows Maurice in bed in a picture taken by Nelly (the author's mother) with her father's camera.

The anecdote of this picture is that Maurice always asked his youngest sister and Nelly to play outdoors close to his room to watch them play. Nelly had climbed through the window to take this picture. It was the bedroom located downstairs in the South-West corner of the house. Given the shadows shown, it must have been in the afternoon. A short time later, Agnes Declercq had fabricated a seesaw for the two girls when Nelly broke her arm due to inattention. Maurice freaked out to Agnes that she had paid insufficient attention, but he couldn't do anything since he was in bed.

Thanks to this picture, it's lovely how an instance of these anecdotes survived.

46.2.5 His Military Service

When Maurice Declercq became a military, Belgium was highly involved in the post-war occupation of Germany. Practically every Belgian soldier at that time spent several months in Germany.

At first, they occupied a sector, but later, they provided Germany's military defense against the Russians. The efforts ensured that Germany would not need an army.

The 'Belgian Armed Forces in Germany' contained military forces and an occupied territory. They were a Belgian occupation force in Germany just after WWII in West Germany. The Belgian troops were under British command because they had previously been assigned to the British as their occupation sector.

From April 1, 1946, three Belgian infantry brigades in Germany were under British command; they operated as occupation units. Shortly afterward, the Belgian units were given their particular zone within the British occupation sector, called the BSD, Belgische strijdkrachten in Duitsland. Thus, the Belgian army controlled an entire zone between Aachen, Cologne, Soest, Siegen, and Kassel, mainly in North Rhine-Westphalia. A garrison was also located in Bonn until the founding of the Federal Republic of Germany, BDR, the Bundesrepublik Deutschland, on May 23, 1949. Then, the commander of the Belgian armed forces, General Piron, had to free up space and release buildings occupied by the Belgians for the new Federal Republic government.

Hij was een man getekend door rechtvaardigheid en mildheid, die doordrongen was van de traditie van zijn voorvaderen, maar zijn brede visie gericht hield op de toekomst.

Hij heeft het geluk gehad van een lang leven te mogen genieten, teruggetrokken in het kader van een prachtige natuur, waar hij zo intens van genoot en die voor hem steeds een inspiratiebron was in zijn zoektocht naar het mysterie in elk bestaan.

Hij leefde volgens zijn eigen denkwijze :
niet alles te aanvaarden maar proberen te begrijpen;
niet alles goed te keuren maar eenieder te vergeven;
niets te verwerpen maar in alles het stukje echtheid te zoeken waaruit de waarheid voortspruit.

Nu hij zijn leven heeft afgesloten leeft hij verder in ons.
Is iemand gestorven als hij blijft leven in ons hart ?

Il avait fait sienne cette devise :
ne pas tout accepter mais essayer de tout comprendre;
ne pas tout approuver mais tout pardonner;

NATO, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, was founded on April 4, 1949, and the BDR became a NATO partner on May 9, 1955. The Soviet Union, with its Warsaw Pact, established on May 14, 1955, and which included the DDR, the Deutsche Demokratische Republik, had meanwhile become the new enemy.

The Belgian forces resided in Germany in a NATO context, as the DBR was also part of it. They assisted, with the British and the Americans, in defense of West Germany against the Warsaw Pact.[4]

Maurice was a military engineer in the Belgian army and received general engineering training specializing in bridge design, construction, and fast assembly strategy. In this role, he also learned to drive every armed vehicle and was, as such, allowed to drive motorized automobiles ranging from motorcycles to large trucks and buses for the rest of his life. He has, however, never used them as such and has only driven his passenger cars.

Maurice's coordinates were nr 60/10876, corps Gn 8579[5]. He was first trained at the Turnhout Infantry unit and later joined PCR 3003.19 Geniecommando SP nr 120, BPS 4 - BSD.

In Germany, he was stationed at Westhoven and Vogelsang. At Vogelsang, he once saved the life of a soldier who could not swim and had decided to go in the water.[6]

Maurice called Vogelsang 'the most beautiful place on earth' in his letters. The author took the picture in Figure 46.18 in 2019. He had to attend a congress in Aachen (ICA) and drove from Metz, in the dark, to his destination, a family hotel just outside Aachen. Because of road works, bad weather, and traffic jams, the global positioning system on his phone sent him through tiny roads, through the hills, in the rain, along numerous curves when suddenly, totally unexpected, he passed by Vogelsang and remembered his father's letters. Earlier, he had not profoundly investigated Vogelsang's location because a preliminary search had not delivered any match. Indeed, his father had always misspelled it in his letters as 'Vogelzang.'

Suddenly, being there was like a gift from above. The next day, before the congress began, he quickly visited the place and took a couple of pictures. On his way to the congress, he saw relics of the Siegfried line, an exciting experience.

A couple of memorabilia and pictures are presented in Figures 46.17, 46.19, 46.20, 46.21 and 46.23.

Maurice has always had a passion for cars and vehicles in general. Having an opportunity to receive the entire range of possible driver's licenses must have been a very appealing side-activity during his service in the army. He cherished some souvenirs, shown in Figure 46.22. Interestingly, when the author learned to drive, he taught him many things from the military. A particular example is always walking around the car before opening the door and quickly checking if the tires are okay and if there is no visible damage. Furthermore, regular checks of the oil, water, and engine's overall appearance were part of the training. The most important lesson was always to catch the mistakes made by others. In other words, a driver must anticipate what other drivers may do wrong to avoid accidents. Such lessons, stemming from the army and transmitted many decades later, are still invaluable to the author and his children.

What Maurice studied most enthusiastically during his stay in the army was the pleasure of engineering. Even the most minor

de
Madeleine Riquet de Caraman
Comtesse Charles de Beauffort née à Paris le 9 février 1881 et décédée en son château de Bossuit le 7 Avril 1975.

Elle aimait la vie et elle sut mourir.

Sa mort a laissé une plaie profonde en nos cœurs.

"Daignez, mon Dieu, ne pas séparer dans le ciel ceux que vous avez unis si étroitement sur la terre." (Lacordaire)

Seigneur, donnez-lui le bonheur qu'elle a voulu nous donner à tous.

J'ai rejoint ceux que j'aimais et j'attends ceux que j'aime.

Je ne pars pas, j'arrive.

Madeleine Riquet de Caraman
Gravin Charles de Beauffort geboren te Parijs, de 9 Februari 1881 en overleden in haar kasteel te Bossuit de 7 April 1975.

Zij hield van het leven en beleefde de dood.

Haar overlijden heeft in onze harten een diepe wonde achtergelaten.

"Gelieve, mijn God, in de hemel niet te scheiden diegenen die U hier op aarde zo innig verenigd hebt." (Lacordaire)

Gelieve, O Heer, haar het geluk te willen schenken dat zij aan ons allen heeft willen uitreiken.

Ik ga hen vervoegen die ik bemind heb en wacht op U die mij zo dierbaar zijt.

Ik vertrek niet, ik kom thuis bij de Heer.

crafts were like an engineering project to him, considering ideas, a pre-study, gathering all the materials, enjoying the manufacturing process, and, finally, admiring the final product.

He transmitted this enthusiasm later to his son, the author, although the latter often has more significant time constraints. The author fabricated uncountable things with his father during his youth. The pleasure of constructing, whether very small or tremendous and the sense of accomplishment is exhilarating when the task is accomplished.

Maurice enjoyed farming. Gardening is fun, but growing potatoes could appeal more to the author.

Maurice was likewise a good horse rider and could handle draft horses. He learned these skills as a child during his numerous visits to Daniel Lesage and Magdalena Meersseman. Had he been in the army 30 years earlier, such skills would have served him well.

Before Maurice reached the end of his duty, he had a life-threatening accident, described in Chapter 46.2.6.

46.2.6 His Nearly Deadly Accident in 1961

Soldiers were occasionally granted leave to return home, typically every few months. It was customary for them to hold a farewell party before rejoining their units, often culminating in a pub crawl with friends. On the eve of Maurice Declercq's return to the army, he embarked on such a pub crawl with two friends and his brother Marcel. Each of the boys was driving a Vespa scooter, as in Figure 46.24.

After visiting various establishments, the group halted in Deerlijk along the road to Vichte. In Het Lindenhof, they consumed a substantial amount of beer in a short period. Despite the lack of alcohol control and fewer cars on the road, the dangers of their actions were undeniable. They set off for home, heavily intoxicated, and prudently separated, with Maurice bringing up the rear.

At some point, Marcel noticed his brother was no longer visible and presumed Maurice had taken another route home. However, an ominous feeling prompted Marcel to retrace his steps, only to find Maurice unconscious in a ditch on Vichtesteenweg, shown in Figure 46.24. Marcel urgently sought help from Dr. Philippe Monbaliu, described in Chapter 45.9, their family physician, who had delivered Maurice in 1941. Unable to call an ambulance and lacking a car, Marcel raced home to enlist the aid of their neighbor, René Vangheluwe[7].

That night, Marcel and René rushed Maurice, still in a coma, to the Sacred Heart Hospital in Kortrijk, the same hospital where Maurice's mother had died a few years earlier. The emergency department was staffed by nuns, who promptly summoned a doctor. An X-ray revealed Maurice had suffered a ruptured liver, likely from the scooter's handlebars, and a possibly damaged aorta, leading to internal bleeding. The nuns, deeming his condition hopeless, suggested administering the last rites. However, Dr. Guido Baekelandt, a cousin of Dr. André Baekelandt who had previously operated on Maurice's mother, described in Chapter 45.2.1, resolved to attempt surgery. It was his first liver operation in Kortrijk.

Post-surgery, Dr. Baekelandt could only offer a guarded prognosis. Maurice's family, mistakenly informed of his death, was devastated. Upon discovering Maurice was still alive but in critical condition, they rushed to the hospital. The ensuing healing process was excruciating, with Maurice often begging for release from his pain. Yet, after weeks of struggle, he began to recover.
